PREFACE

THIS book is the outcome of a month spent in Greece in the early spring of 1905. From my own experience, I am led to hope that other travellers will find their pleasure in visiting scenes of classic association increased by reading on the spot passages from the ancient poets and story-tellers, which those scenes recall.

The following pages contain a number of such passages, connected by a slender thread of narrative.

Many of the passages are very famous, and have already been admirably translated. My only excuse for offering new translations of these is that, as the best translation in the world can only partly reproduce the feeling of an original poem, each new translation may possibly contain something which will contribute its mite towards the unattainable total.

NOTE ON THE TRANSLATIONS

IN most of the translations I aim to be as nearly literal as possible. I usually reproduce hexameters by hexameters, and Iambic trimeters by blank verse. It seems quite impossible to reproduce in English the more difficult meters without wide departure from the original words. In such cases I make an attempt either by an occasional rhymed ending, or by a faint echo of the general rhythm, to preserve something of the ancient lyrical spirit. When this has seemed impossible, all that I have attempted is a division of the passages into verses of lengths varying somewhat in harmony with those of the original.

For the sake of variety, I have done a few passages into English rhymed verse. In these instances the translation is, of course, less literal.

The spelling of proper names is not strictly consistent. Where a name has become thoroughly anglicized, I use the familiar spelling.

The original text of the principal poetical passages is printed in the Appendix.

CHAPTER I

ACROPOLIS

THE historian, the archæologist, and the architect have told the world so much about the Acropolis that a detailed account of the buildings would be superfluous in these pages. It is purposed rather to invoke the ancient writers of song and story to repeat to us the legends of the Holy Hill.

The Acropolis rises high over the city and is seldom out of the sight or the thoughts of the traveller. One acquires the habit of visiting it nearly every day. As we mount the crowded streets and long stone stairways leading from the lower town on the north, we pause for a moment near the spot once occupied by the Prytaneum, or we search in vain for traces of the Temple of the Dioscuri which must have been somewhere near. We lift the eyes and high above us we see, built into the walls, the drums of the ancient Temple of Athene which were utilized in the rebuilding of the Acropolis fortification after the Persian War. Lower down we catch sight of a small opening in the jagged rocks, and after a rough and difficult scramble, the opening enlarges and we find ourselves at the entrance of the grotto of Aglauros.

Aglauros was one of the three daughters of Cecrops, the ancient king of Athens. Her sisters were Herse and Pandrosos. To the care of the three princesses Athene committed the mysterious infant Erichthonius. The child was hidden in a chest which the goddess bade the sisters by no means to open. Pandrosos obeyed the injunction, but Aglauros could not be content. The chest was opened, and behold an infant with a serpent coiled about him. Smitten with terror or with the madness of remorse, the sisters leaped from the cliff and perished. At this very time Athene was busy at the work of fortifying her beloved citadel, and was carrying a small mountain through the air to buttress the northern wall. A crow brought her the news of the opening of the chest, and in her agitation and rage, she dropped the mountain which now dominates the town as Lycabettus. The crow, as bearer of ill-tidings, was forbidden thenceforth to light on the Acropolis.

Another tale relates that Athene, to punish Aglauros for her curiosity, inspired her with jealousy of her sister Herse, who was loved by the god Hermes.

In punishment Hermes turned her to stone. Yet another version of the story of Aglauros tells that she leaped from the cliff to save her country, when an oracle had demanded a victim as the price of victory in war.

It was doubtless in connection with this nobler tradition that in after times, when the Youth of Athens reached the age of military service, they received in this cave the shield and spear, and in the name of Aglauros, took the oath of devotion to their country. Henceforth "They¹ swear to regard as the boundaries of Attica, 'The Wheat, the Barley, the Vine and the Olive;' being taught to consider as their own all lands that are cultivated and fruitful."

When Pisistratus wished to disarm the citizens, that his tyranny might be the more secure, he bade them all bring their weapons to the Anakeion.² "They came, and his henchmen advancing took away the arms and deposited them in the sacred precinct of Aglauros."

We enter the cave, and overhead, in the dim light, we can make out a staircase hewn in the rock. Wooden steps doubtless continued this to the floor of the cave in ancient times. It was the staircase of the maidens who, at the yearly festival, carried a mysterious chest down from the Erechtheum through the cavern to the precinct of Eileithyia in the city below. To the westward of the grotto, another stairway climbs the steep rocks — the Makrae,¹ as they were called, — and leads to the Pandroseum, the open platform lying to the westward of the Erechtheum and named for the good sister Pandrosos. It is a difficult climb. This is the way² by which Herodotus tells us³ the Persians, after many fruitless efforts to capture the Acropolis, at last succeeded in effecting an entrance. They quickly massacred the remnant who stayed behind when the rest of the Athenians had fled to Salamis, and they burned and destroyed everything in the Citadel. Yet though they burned the sacred olive planted by Athene herself, lo, within two days, the immortal tree shot up higher than before.

We follow a difficult path to the westward along a slightly lower level. In a few minutes we come to a second grotto — that of Pan — bestowed on the god in gratitude for his assistance at the battle of Marathon. Euripides, who is not sensitive about chronology, tells us how Pan was wont to sit in his cave and pipe for the maidens to dance in the Pandroseum overhead:

² Or possibly the above mentioned staircase inside the grotto.

³ Herodotus, viii. 53 and 55.

“ Oh ¹ thou haunt of the mighty Pan,
Rock by the Long Cliff cavernous,
Where with their feet the sisters three,
 Aglauros' ² daughters fair,
Oft tread their dances beside the fane
Of Pallas, over the verdant lawn,
In time to the varied sound of Hymn
 When thou art piping there;

“ Oh Pan, within thy cavern grot,
 Where once of old a maid,
A mother too, ah hapless one!
 Her tender infant laid — Offspring of Phoebus — as a feast
 To winged creatures wild,
And bloody banquet to the beast
 She left her helpless child.

“ Ah dreadful deed! — the fruit
Of union bitter — never have I learned
 In tapestry embroidered,
 Nor yet in story told,
 That happiness to mortal's lot Hath been vouchsafed through offspring god-begot,
 Now or in days of old.”

² The mother of the maidens was also called Aglauros.

The Western Grotto — that of Apollo — is less interesting in itself, though lately it has figured in Dr. Dörpfeld's able exposition of controverted topographical problems.¹ According to Pausanias, it was here and not in Pan's cave that Apollo begat Ion. The walls are covered with shallow niches for votive offerings similar to those in Aphrodite's sanctuary in the pass of Daphne.

We climb a rough staircase only to find our upward way blocked by modern masonry. We stoop, however, and enter at the left a low chamber, used at one time as a Christian chapel — "Of the Apostles" — and adorned with rude Christian paintings. In the centre is the mouth of the cistern called Clepsydra, which supplied the water-clock in the Tower of the Winds in the city below. When, during the war of Independence, the Turks were besieged in the Acropolis, they were in sore straits for want of water. After the citadel was won by the Greeks, Odysseus Andritsos built a wall enclosing the Clepsydra, and the supply was secure.² The name "Water-Stealer" refers to the frequent fluctuations in the depth of the well.

Traces of masonry below the shrine of Apollo mark the beginning of the Pelasgicon. This was an ancient precinct, extending from this point round the western end of the Acropolis, and along the southern slope nearly to the sanctuary of Asclepios. It was against the law to erect buildings in the enclosure. Just after the Persian War, however, when the Athenians returned from Salamis, they were permitted to live here temporarily.

A little to the northwest there rises a rough rock with a gloomy cavern in its eastern side. To most people it is a disappointment to learn that this barren, uninteresting place is the famous Areopagus, believed by many to be the Hill of Mars,¹ where St. Paul stood, and, with the great temples of the Periclean Age full in view, declared to the Athenians that "The Lord who made Heaven and Earth dwelleth not in temples made with hands." A few rough steps lead to the top of the rock, and there are some traces here of the spot where the great Life and Death Tribunal sat. We are told of two stones on which plaintiff and defendant used to stand. The one was called the Stone of Outrage, the other the Stone of Shamelessness. The court was sanctified by the goddess Athene herself, when Orestes was tried here for the murder of his mother. The vote was a tie, and the goddess decreed that forever after a tie should mean acquittal. The Plaintiff Furies in their rage and disappointment threatened dire consequences to the land, until at last they were appeased by Athene, and induced to take up their abode in a cavern beneath the rock, where they were henceforth to be honoured as Eumenides — Reverend Well-Wishers. The end of the great Trilogy of Aeschylus represents the solemn procession which conducts the Eumenides to their new abode. Blessings unbounded are now invoked upon the land, reversing the former imprecations.

Chorus of Eumenides: “ Oh ¹ hail, all hail in the blessings of wealth —

Hail ye people of the town, ye whose dwelling is near Zeus.

Loved of the beloved Maid, blest with wisdom now at last

High in the esteem of Zeus, since 'neath Pallas' wing ye rest.

Athene: “ All hail ye as well, but first I must go

To show you the place of your future abode,
By the sacred torches of these your guides,
With sacrifice solemn, your path we attend.

Go, haste 'neath the Earth, every evil henceforth
To keep from our land, but all blessings to send
To our city victorious ever.

And ye lead the way for these our new guests,
Oh Kranaos' sons, ye guards of the State,
 And be good their intent
Of every good thing to the people.

Chorus: "Oh hail, all hail again in portion double!

All ye dwellers in the land, deities and mortal men —

Ye who Pallas' city sway, — and if ye my dwelling place

Shall with piety revere, no disaster need ye dread."

Marshals of the Procession: "Go to your homes,
ye Mighty Ones, high honoured;

Children of Night, by joyful throng attended —

Keep holy silence, people of the land!

'Neath ancient darkness of the lurking-places

Of Earth, with honourable off'rings splendid, —

Keep holy silence, all ye citizens!

"Propitious and kind to our land

Come hither, oh reverend train,

With torch brightly burning your glad path discerning;

Ye people respond to our strain,

With shout of rejoicing again.

“ Libation and torchlight attend.
For Zeus hath vouchsafed to descend
As champion all-seeing, and Fate too, agreeing; —
Ye people respond to our strain,
With shout of rejoicing again.”

We mount the long flight of steps leading to the citadel, and stop to rest on the platform of the Niké Apteros Temple. In the early part of the nineteenth century, there was left of the beautiful little temple not one stone upon another, when Ross discovered its fragments built into a Turkish bastion. Wonderful to relate, little of importance was missing, except a piece of the frieze taken by Lord Elgin to London. The temple was rebuilt in 1835 in almost unimpaired beauty.

“ Most holy Victory, my life attend
Nor weary, crowns bestowing! ” ¹

“ From ² this place there is a wide view over the sea, and here Aegeus having thrown himself down, as they say, perished. For the ship which carried the youths and maidens to Crete, put to sea with black sails. Now Theseus — for he sailed forth with some confidence against the so-called Bull of Minos — agreed with his father that he would use white sails, if he should sail homeward victorious over the Bull. But he forgot all this, when he carried off Ariadne. Accordingly Aegeus, when he saw the ship approaching with black sails, supposing his son to have perished, hurled himself from the height and was destroyed." The "wide view over the sea" well deserves its fame.

In Plato's Phaedo we learn how the expedition of Theseus influenced the circumstances of the death of Socrates.¹

Phaedo. "It chanced that on the day before the trial the wreath had been hung on the stern of the ship which the Athenians are wont to despatch to Delos."

Echecrates. "What ship is that?"

Phaedo. "That refers to the vessel — as the Athenians say — in which once upon a time Theseus carried the 'twice seven' to Crete, and wrought them deliverance and was delivered himself. Now they vowed then to Apollo, as it is said, that if they should be delivered, they would conduct a sacred embassy to Delos each year. And they despatch this embassy yearly in honour of the god from that day even until now. Therefore, when they begin the mission, it is their custom to keep the city pure from defilement during that space and to put no man to death publicly, until the ship come to Delos and return hither again. And this is sometimes a long interval of time, when it happens that winds detain them. And the beginning of the mission is the moment when the priest of Apollo places a wreath on the stern of the ship. And this took place, as I say, the day before the trial. So then a long time elapsed for Socrates in the prison, the time between his trial and his death."

Upon the Niké platform once stood the group of the Three Graces by Socrates. The imagination finds it difficult to connect the good old sage with such work, and the archæologists are inclined to doubt the authorship. It must be remembered, however, that Socrates was the son of a sculptor, and we can find in his sayings hints of a special devotion to the Graces as well as of his practical knowledge of the art of sculpture.

“ For¹ what without the Graces is by man
To be desired? Ever be my lot Beside the Graces cast.”

Ye who dwell in the land of goodly steeds.

Oh theme of poet's song, oh Queens
Of bright Orchomenus,
Ye Graces, guardians of the ancient Minyae,
Hear when I pray.

“For with you all that is delightsome,
All that is sweet,
On mortals is bestowed,
If one be wise or fair or splendid.

“For not without the Graces holy,
Even the gods rule dance or festival;
But ministers of all in heaven,
Their throne they set beside Apollo Pythian,
And reverence the glory everlasting
Of their Olympian Sire.

“Aglaia queenly and Euphrosyne,
Lover of songs, oh hearken!
Ye daughters of the mightiest of gods.
And thou Thalia who in hymns delightest,
This joyful troop beholding
Beneath the smile of Fortune
As with light step it treadeth.”

The Propylaea seems, next after the Parthenon, to have been the building in which the Athenians took the greatest pride. It is indeed a glorious entrance to the glorious sanctuary. The great buildings of the Acropolis have, however, been often described. Let us rather note minor details of our stroll about the citadel, which recall some tale or excite some reflection of interest.

We enter the mighty gate, passing the north-west wing which was once adorned with the paintings of Polygnotus,¹ and the southwest wing, altered and cramped from the original design. The ancient precinct of Artemis Brauronia near by might not be entrenched upon. Just inside the entrance is the base of a monument which recalls the care and affection bestowed by Pericles on the works undertaken, during his administration, for the adornment of his City. One of the workmen employed on the roof of the Propylaea, fell and was seriously injured. In gratitude for a miraculous recovery, the head of the State himself caused a votive offering in honour of Hygeia, the goddess of healing, to be erected on this base.

In spring the rock is carpeted with wild flowers, which peep out between the innumerable fragments of masonry and sculpture lying about the whole inclosure. Anemones of all colours, daisies, asphodels, and certain beautiful pink and yellow flowers unfamiliar to foreign eyes, spring up wherever there is enough soil, and supply in some measure the brightness of colouring which must have pervaded the scene in ancient times. To understand why the undoubted custom of using colour on the sculptural and architectural details did not strike as vulgar and gaudy this most sensitive of peoples, we must try to recall the brilliant surroundings, in the days when the gaily dressed throng advanced in the Panathenaic procession along a road lined on both sides with innumerable votive offerings. All the bright bronze and gilded chariots and shrines are gone, and there remains only the hard rock of the road bed, deeply rutted by the ancient wheels. Naturally then it is not easy for us to realize that a statue or building of unrelieved whiteness might have seemed cold and cheerless to the eyes of the festal throngs.

As we advance towards the Erechtheum, we pause with interest at the remains of the pedestal on which stood one of the three colossal statues designed by Phidias. This was the Athene Promachos, champion warrior goddess, less serene and calmly beautiful than the gold and ivory maiden of the Parthenon hard by; but dear to the sailor and to the traveller returning from abroad.

For “ of ¹ this Athene the point of the spear and the crest of the helmet become visible to those approaching by sea from Sunium."

The statue was of bronze from the spoils " of the Medes who landed at Marathon."

In the Odyssey (viii, 80 and 81) the Goddess Athene " came to Marathon and entered the stoutly-built house of Erechtheus."

This building —

" Where ¹ first Athene brought to light
The shoot of the gray olive — A heavenly crown —
And ornament to brilliant Athens," —

has lately undergone a good deal of restoration. The work has been well done, and has doubtless preserved from ruin the famous North Porch which has served as a model for so many doorways. The Porch of the " Caryatides " is more beautiful than photographs might lead us to expect, and we recall the pretty modern saying that " These maidens in their mournful dignity are thinking of their sister in distant London."

It was in or near the Pandroseum, on the western side of the Erechtheum, that the great discovery was made in 1886 of the charming statues of archaic maidens. These are now in the Acropolis Museum.

One grows more and more to admire — even love — these dear ladies. One has somewhat the feeling about them that one has about the maidens of Botticelli, while to the historian of art they are of inestimable value.

South of the Erechtheum may be seen many traces of the Old Temple which stood here before the Persian War. These ruins are of great interest to the archæologist, but are not easy for a layman to comprehend. We pass gigantic drums of prostrate columns and at last enter the Parthenon. Even in its wrecked condition the wonderful temple overwhelms the senses, the head, and above all the heart. What it must have been in the days of its glory we cannot attempt to conceive; but though shorn of almost all ornament, and with most of its columns overthrown, it is still the Parthenon. Stand where the great statue stood and look East to Lycabettus,¹ over which the morning sun still climbs; or mount the little stairway that leads to the southwestern corner of the roof, and gaze down over the valley of the Ilissus or across the bay to Aegina; or sit on the western steps with the back resting in one of the flutings of a mighty column, looking forth to the far mountains of the Peloponnesus, as the sun sinks behind Salamis, and darkness steals across Piræus and the Attic plain; — it is still overwhelmingly the Parthenon, though London claims the greater part of the frieze and pediment and metopes, and though much of what remains is battered beyond recognition or has perished utterly. The western frieze is beautiful still, and several of the best slabs of the eastern frieze are preserved in the little Acropolis Museum whither we next bend our steps, to spend a happy hour among the queer monsters from the archaic temple, and the fine work of Pisistratid and early Phidian times.

As we emerge and stroll along the south wall of the Acropolis, we pass the site of the famous votive offering of Attalus, replicas of the chief figures of which are to be found in many of the museums of Europe. To one of these figures is undoubtedly owed the inspiration which produced the "Dying Gaul." We are told that part of this offering was once blown over the wall by a mighty wind, and was found in the theatre of Dionysus below.

We descend from the Acropolis and take the path leading to the left along the southern slope. Skirting the top row of seats of the well-preserved Odeum of Herodes Atticus, — a public-spirited benefactor of the Roman epoch, who built this monument to the memory of his wife Regilla, — one passes a succession of fragmentary remains of old Pelasgic work, and finally reaches the much ruined precinct of Asclepios,¹ where it is still possible to drink a cup of the healing water of Hygeia's fountain.

One is glad to rest in the theatre of Dionysus, and dream of the scenes enacted here. Though nearly all the present building dates from a period far later than the days of the Mighty Four, yet here is the very spot where the most intelligent audience in the world met at the festival of the God to witness the great dramatic contests. Here were enacted the woes of the cursed line of Pelops, and the horrors of the house of Oedipus; here Prometheus made his immortal appeal against the tyranny of the gods; here Alcestis taught the depths of woman's self-immolating love; and here too, in joyful hours, the holiday crowd took its delight in the merry squibs flung at their wiseacres and demagogues.²

Above our heads just under the Acropolis walls near the cave of Hagia Speliotissa stand two columns. They are relics of a Choragic victory, and as we turn our steps homeward to the modern city, we pass close to another such memorial, the beautiful little Corinthian monument of Lysicrates.

² In the days when good-natured Socrates stood up during a performance of the Clouds, to give the spectators a good chance to compare him with his namesake on the stage.

CHAPTER II

COLONUS AND THE ACADEMY

PERHAPS most excursions in foreign lands should be made in the company of one or more friends. So much is gained by exchange of ideas, and so much of the beauty of nature is doubly enjoyable, when one feels that another is sympathetically affected, even if no word be spoken. The walk here described, however, should be a solitary one, at least for the first time. Afterwards the scenes may well be revisited and the memory refreshed by expression to a companion of that which at first was all impression.

Down the long hill from the northeast corner of the Acropolis slope to the Dipylon, we take our way through crooked streets and past somewhat bewildering ruins chiefly of Roman date. We receive a confusion of impressions of Athens Modern, Roman, and Hellenic; Athens Ecclesiastical, Commercial, Christian, and Pagan. First we pass the ugly Metropolitan: then a better Byzantine church; then a busy street of shops; an old monastery, a Roman Market Gate, and a portico of distorted giants; then the calm Theseum high on the left, the railway station; and at last we reach the ruined City Gate, and the peaceful cemetery of the Outer Ceramicus.

We wander slowly among these tombs where sleep the ancient dead, the poor and the rich, the lowly and the great alike. Here we are particularly struck with the incredible productivity of Greek Art. Hundreds of the grave monuments of the Ceramicus are without special renown, and yet nearly every one is of great beauty. Most of the masterpieces have been taken to the Museum for shelter from the weather, but enough remain in place to give joy and wonder to the beholder, and send him on his way with high and holy thoughts. Here is the brave young knight who fell at Corinth, for ever striking down the foe beneath his rearing charger; beyond is the great lady, taking her necklace from the jewel-case held by her comely maid; near by is the splendid charging bull; the great hound with the upward glance of despair; the grave elder with his wife and sons; and at last the pathetic empty tombs consisting of four simple gray slabs and lid. This scene of solemnity and beauty is surely a fitting place in which to bid farewell to the city and the works of man, before turning our steps onward to nature and the Attic spring time.

It was in the first year of the Peloponnesian War that Pericles uttered on this spot the famous funeral-oration preserved for us by Thucydides:

“ I¹ will begin first with our forefathers. For it is right and seemly on such an occasion, to lay at their feet this tribute of remembrance. For the same stock, ever dwelling in this land, have handed it down free through their virtue by succession of descendants to this day. They are worthy of all praise, and of greater praise still our own sires are deserving. For, after winning in addition to their inheritance, the great dominion we now rule, they transmitted it intact to us not without toil on their part.

“ But I pass on to the encomium of these men. For I deem it were not idly spoken, and that this mighty throng of citizens and strangers would hear the same with profit.”

“ For we enjoy a polity which needs not emulate the laws of our neighbours, but which rather serves them as model. . . .”

So began the proud oration. Athens, the true democracy of Moderation, the home of Piety, and of all that adorns civilized life — this was the theme of Pericles, and we can picture to ourselves the great crowd as it departed from the cemetery filled with undying devotion to such a fatherland, and with high resolution to face for her sake all that the oncoming days of war and pestilence might have in store.

“ And ¹ more — we have provided for the spirit resting places after toil, religious games and services throughout the year, adorned with the grace and beauty our own liberality provides, the joy of which day by day makes us forget our sorrows. Through the greatness of our state, all things flow hither from all the world, and it falls to our lot to reap with no more familiar enjoyment the blessings our own land provides than those which come to us from alien peoples. . . . In our education, our sons by toilsome effort from their earliest youth pursue the path of manliness. . . . We love the Beautiful with chastened taste, and pursue Philosophy without effeminate weakness. Wealth we enjoy more as furnishing opportunity for deeds, than as occasion for empty boast; and it is no shame to confess poverty. . . .

“ Wherefore also I have dwelt at length on our polity, in order to teach the lesson that for us the struggle is for a far nobler stake than it is for those who share in no such blessings; and also in order to manifest by illustration the praise of those concerning whom I now speak. And the chief part of the eulogy has been spoken. For the brave deeds of these and such as these have adorned the tale of our city which I have told, and not in the case of many Greeks could words and deeds balance thus equally in the scale. . . . And these our dead were such in their lives in wise beseeeming such a city. But it behoves the survivors to pray that they may maintain a spirit more fortunate in the event, perhaps, but not a whit less daring towards the foe. . . . For of famous men the whole world is sepulchre; and not only the inscriptions written on their steles at home proclaim their story, but even in alien lands, the unwritten remembrance of their spirit even more than of their deeds abides in every man. Do you then emulate these men to-day and, holding that Happiness consists in Liberty, and Liberty in Stoutness of Soul, shrink not from the dangers of war. For it is not the wretched who have no hope of good, who should more justly be unsparing of their lives; but those in whose case the opposite lot in life is still in the balance, and in whose fortunes the change will be most tremendous, if in aught they stumble.”

The road ¹ leads northward for about a mile, until it passes the foot of a bare hill which rises on the right. It is a dreary little hill. Scant grass, gray pebbles, red, muddy soil, no trees. A forlorn and ugly place. But the view is the recompense. The hill commands a beautiful prospect of the Acropolis-crowned city, the Attic mountains, the olive groves of the Cephisian Plain, the road winding up the pass of Daphne, Salamis, Aegina, and the glorious sea. To the north the Plain of Attica is defended by the range of Mount Parnes. The clouds float over our heads from the mountain towards the city as they did in days of old to alight on the stage of the theatre of Dionysus.

“ Let ¹ us rise to view
Clouds ever floating,
Of nature unstable,
Shining with dew.
From our Father Ocean groaning deep
To tree-clad mountain-summits steep,
Where our far-gazing watch
O'er the sacred soil,
Moist with its fruitage,
We still maintain.
And we hear the murmurs
Of holy rivers,
And the roar of the heavy-thundering main.

“ For the eye of Ether unwearied gleams,
Bright with its marble-dazzling beams.

“ But cast we aside our wrapping of storms,
 And gaze over Earth
 With eye far-seeing,
 Clad in our native immortal forms.

“ Virgins Rain-bearing,
 Let us go to the radiant Country of Pallas,
 Of Heroes daring.
 Of Cecrops the lovely land to behold,
 Of the awful sacred rites untold,
 Where the mystic shrine
 With service pious
 Is opened wide;
 And gifts most rare,
 And high-roofed fanes
 With images holy,
 And the pomp of the blessed ones are there.

“ And service and festival fair-crowned
 In every season still abound.

“ And the Bacchic mirth as the Spring advances,
 And the heavy murmuring
 Music of flutes,
 And the joy of the sweet-resounding dances.”

Colonus itself is incredible. For this desolate hill is the one of which Sophocles sang. In his old age the poet was accused of imbecility, and, instead of making a defence, he read before his judges the famous ode in praise of his birthplace, thereby giving proof that his fires were burning undimmed.

“ To ¹ the fairest spot in the land, oh guest,
Of steeds of goodly training,
Thou art come, to Colonus the gleamingwhite,
Where the nightingale, loud complaining,

“ With wail incessant doth fill the grove,
In the verdant coppice hidden,
Where the ivy dark is her haunting-place,
And the shrine of the god, forbidden

“ To mortal footstep — the leafy shrine
With myriad fruitage teeming, Unshaken by breath of wildest storm,
Unscorched by the sunlight gleaming.

“ There the reveller-god, Dionysus, oft
In the midst of his nymphs attendant —
His nurses divine — doth lead the dance,
And with heavenly dew resplendent,

“ Narcissus, of mightiest Goddess-Pair
The chaplet in ancient story,
Its lovely clusters each passing day
Unfoldeth in constant glory.

“ And golden gleameth the crocus bright,
Nor ever the Springs unsleeping
Which feed the streams of Cephisus fail,
In their task through the meadows creeping.

“ But still unstinted from day to day
O’er the land’s broad bosom streaming,
The river poureth its stainless flood
With swiftest foison teeming.

“ Nor the holy band of the Muses nine,
As they ply their mystic dancing,
Nor Aphrodite the golden-reined
Avoid the spot entrancing.”

It was at this blessed place that weary Oedipus heard the voice which bade him rest at last from his long sorrow, and here the exile found peace.

Messenger: “ But ¹ when he came to where the path descends,
With brazen pavement rooted in the earth
He stayed at one of many parted ways,

Near to a hollow, where Pirithoüs
And Theseus made their ever-faithful league.
Halting 'twixt this and the Thorician Rock,
Beside the Hollow Sloe and stony vault,
He sat him down, and loosed his squalid robes,
And, calling to his daughters, bade them fetch Baths and libations from some running stream.
But they their sire's behest fulfilling, climbed Verdant Demeter's hill of prospect wide,
And in brief time the water fetched, and washed,
And with fresh garments clothed him, as is wont.
And when the task was done to his content,
And naught remained undone that he desired,
Zeus of the nether world loud thundered — they,
The maidens, shuddered when they heard, and wept,
And, falling at their father's knees, they spared
Nor rendings of the breast, nor wailings long.
But straightway he, hearing the bitter cry,
Folding his arms about them, spake to them:
'Children, ye have this day no father more.
For lo, my time hath all run out, and ye
No more shall ply your toilsome ministry.
Hard task I know, my children, but one word
Alone redeems the whole of this your toil.
For dearer love from no man have ye had
Than from your father, and, of this bereft,
Ye now must pass the remnant of your lives.'
With words like these, and mutual embrace Sobbing, they wept together till they reached

An end of wailing, and their crying ceased.
A silence fell, when suddenly a Voice
Of one who summoned him, — the hair of all Erect with terror stood, for sudden fright.
The god had called him, called and called again:
'Oedipus, Oedipus, wherefore lingerest
In thy departure? Long hast thou delayed.'
Then he, well knowing 'twas the god who called,
Bade summon Theseus, ruler of the land.
And when he came, 'Oh dearest life,' he said,
'Give me thy hand in pledge of lasting faith
To these my daughters — ye to him — and vow
Ne'er to forsake them willingly, but aye
Vouchsafe such boon as thy kind purpose will.'
But he, as gentle knight, without delay
Promised by oath to do his guest's command.
And when he promised, straightway Oedipus Stroking with feeble hand his daughters, spake:
'Oh children, it beseems the noble heart
To bear this grief, depart then from this place,
Nor seek to hear or see what heaven forbids.
But go with speed, let only Theseus bide,
The Sovereign, to behold what comes to pass.'
These words he uttered, as we all could hear,
And, with a copious flow of tears, the maids
With loud lament were led away, but when,
Brief time elapsing, we returned, we saw
The man no longer present, but the king
Shading his eyes, with hand before his face,

As if some dreadful vision had appeared,
And one no man could bear to look upon.
After a little then — in no long time —
We see him do obeisance to the Earth,
And to Divine Olympus, in one prayer.
But by what fate the stranger perished, none
Of men, save Theseus only, could reveal.
For 'twas no fire-bearing bolt from God
That ended him, no blast from Ocean driven,
But either Heaven-sent guide conducted him,
Or Earth's foundation gaped with kind intent,
And took him to the world below unharmed.
For, not with groaning, nor disease, nor pain,
The man departed; but of human kind
The most to be revered, — and if my words
To some seem madness I shall make no plea
To be believed of those who deem me mad."

The distance is not great from Colonus to the bridge which crosses the Cephisus at the pretty village of Colocythu, whence one can return to Athens by tram. It is far preferable, however, to turn aside and wander along the river-bank, beneath the famous olives, till the Sacred Way is reached, and the cypresses guide one cityward. This is the precinct of Academus, and here we hold communion with Plato and his band of intelligent, high-souled Athenian Youth.

When Plato was sojourning at the court of Dionysius, Tyrant of Syracuse, the liberality of his views once enraged the despot to such an extent that he caused the philosopher to be seized and sold into slavery. He was ransomed by a friend at an unusually high price, and on his return to Athens, the city offered to reimburse the friend. The offer was refused, and the city then voted to use the money in purchasing the plot of ground destined to be immortalized under the name of the Academy.

The plot of ground was already famous. When the Dioscuri came to Attica to rescue their sister Helen — whom Theseus had carried off — an old man, named Academus, revealed to them her place of concealment. Whenever, therefore, in later times the Spartans invaded Attica, they spared his farm — the later Academy — in gratitude for the information. The Tyrant Hipparchus founded here the famous open air gymnasium wherein the youth of Athens might¹ descend to the Academy and run races beneath the Moriae² “crowned with white reed, amid temperate companions, smelling of smilax and of leisure and of the leaf-shedding poplar, rejoicing in the season of spring, when the plane tree whispers to the elm.”

As one walks beside the Cephissus in the shade of the olives, one seems to hear the words of Plato, as he reasoned with his youthful friends, concerning Justice, Courage, Temperance, and Immortality.

“ And ¹ thus, oh Glaucon, was the mystic tale preserved and perished not; and it will save us too if we obey it, and we shall safely pass the stream of Lethe and keep our souls unstained. But if we follow that which I counsel, and believe the soul immortal and able to bear all woe and all weal, we shall ever cleave to the upward road ² and practise Justice with understanding.”

The air was sweet with the early spring flowers. Far in front rose the Acropolis fortress sharp cut in the transparent air against the dark background of Hymettus.

“ Happy ³ in days of old Erechtheus’ sons;
Children of blessed gods were they.
Glorious wisdom’s fruit they ever reaped
From fatherland inviolate.

“ Ever they proudly trod through clearest ether,
Where once Harmonia, golden-haired,
Brought forth the Holy Nine,
The Muses of Pieria.

³ Eurip.: Medea, 824 ff.

“ They sing the Cyprian Goddess how she drew Streams from Cephisus flowing-fair,
 And sent to breathe forth o’er the land
Swift-blowing, moderate breezes of the winds.

 “ And as she casts upon her locks
 Garlands of roses odorous,
 On Mortals she bestows Loves that abide with Wisdom, furthering
 All deeds of goodness ever.”

CHAPTER III

ELEUSIS

WE made the journey to Eleusis by train. The line runs by a circuitous way to the northward of Aegaleos which separates the Thriasian Plain from the rest of Attica. It was a bright morning of early spring and the fruit trees were in full bloom. The finest orchards were in the township of Acharnae, the sufferings of whose inhabitants in the Peloponnesian War are immortalized by Aristophanes.

Phyle, with its memories of Thrasybulus, the Liberator, was not far to our right, and we could see near the top of the mountain pass the remains of a rough stone wall running north and south. This was built by the Athenians as a defence against the Spartans in the beginning of the Peloponnesian War.

The train began to go faster and faster, and rushed down through a region of barren rocks and dwarf pines into the pleasant Thriasian Plain.

The Plain was covered with olive groves, and carpeted with anemones of every colour. This region must have been indeed tempting to the ravages of King Archidamus in the first years of the war, when the Spartan military operations began each spring with the destruction of the crops of this the most fertile plain of Attica; and naturally it is fertile; for the Rarian fields near the town of Eleusis were sown with corn under the direction of the Great Earth Mother herself.

We sped through the plain and approached the shore. The Bay of Salamis was like a mirror. It is here practically a lake, with narrow passages east and west past the spur of Aegaleos on one side and the cape from which rises the hill of the Kerata ¹ on the other. Salamis appeared to be of entirely different shape from that with which we had become familiar looking from the Athenian Acropolis or from Aegina. The island really stretches nearly as far from east to west as from north to south, and is much larger than one would suppose. From Athens, one mentally pictures it as terminating opposite Piraeus, and the view of it as one emerges into the Thriasian Plain is a beautiful surprise. The sharp mountain tops were reflected in the glassy waters of the Bay, and the picturesque fishing boats from the island with their lateen sails added a touch of life to the somewhat lonely scene. At the western end of the plain, where it is limited by the bay and the Kerata, was our goal Eleusis.

Eleusis received its name from the Advent of the mighty Goddesses. It was the birthplace of Aeschylus and the home of the Sacred Mysteries which played such a wonderful part in the spiritual life of the Athenians from the earliest times down to the sad epoch when all the glory had departed from Greece. Cicero,¹ himself an Initiate, could still say of them that "In the Mysteries, we perceive the real principles of life, and learn not only to live happily, but to die with a fairer hope." Long after Christianity began to make its way, the rites of Eleusis survived; and it was not till 395 A. D. that the splendid buildings were thrown down, at the prompting, it is said, of the fanatical monks in the army of Alaric. The orator Aristides bewails the fury which destroyed the shrines. "They alone still stood as a memorial of the old glory and dignity, for Athens and for all Greece."

Pindar ² says of them:

"Blessed is he who, after beholding them,
Beneath the Earth departeth.
For he knoweth the end of Life;
Knoweth too its God-given beginning."

¹ Cicero: De Leg., ii. 14. 36.

² Pindar: Thren., 8.

Sophocles: ¹

“ Would I might be —
By the gleaming shore,
Where the Queenly Ones do cherish
The holy mysteries for men;
Concerning which a golden key
Is laid on lips of ministering Eumolpidae.”

Aristophanes: ²

“ Advance ye now
Through the Goddesses' sacred circle,
Through the flowery grove in mirthful sport,
Ye who have share in the heaven-loved feast;
And I with these maids and matrons go,
Where they vigil keep in the Goddesses' honour,
To carry my holy torch.”

“ Let ³ us go to the flowery meads
O'ergrown with roses fair,
Keeping our mirthful fashion
Of dances beauteous;
By the blessed Fates ordained.
For to us alone is the light of the sun propitious,
To us who the Mysteries have learned,
And a righteous life have led,
Toward citizen and stranger.

² Aristoph.: Frogs, 440.

³ Aristoph.: Frogs, 324.

“Iacchus, oh thou most honoured, here dwelling on thy throne.

Iacchus, oh Iacchus!

Come join the dance, o’er this meadow, join

The holy revelling band.

Shaking on thy head the fruitful crown of myrtle;

Treading with valiant step

The unbridled sportive measure,

Which hath full portion of the Graces, —

The pure, the sacred dance of the holy Mystae.

Awake, for he cometh bearing in his hand the blazing torches!

Iacchus, oh Iacchus!

Fire-bringing star of our rite nocturnal.

The old men’s limbs begin to dance,

And off they cast the cares and weary days

Of lengthy years;

By influence of the holy service;

But thou with blazing torch lead forth

Over the soft-flowering field,

The blessed band of dancing youth.”

The Propylaea and the great hall of the Mysteries are sadly ruined, but of much interest to the archaeologist. The great hall was partly the work of Ictinus, the architect of the Parthenon, and the blue limestone known as the Eleusinian was used largely in its construction. We climbed the hill on which stood the citadel used as a refuge in the Revolution of 403 B. C., and on the way down we visited the little museum of local antiquities. The collection is small but good. The same is true of the museums of many small towns in Greece, and perhaps one enjoys a visit to such a museum more than to one of the fatiguing and bewildering treasures of the great cities of the world. We lunched in the grotto of Pluto, where it is thought that a representation used to be given of the Resurrection of Proserpine from the world below. Here we rested for an hour and read the beautiful Homeric hymn: —¹ “ Fair-haired Demeter to sing I begin — most reverend goddess;

Her and her daughter fair-ankled, whom once the dread ruler of Hades Rapt — and deep-thundering Zeus, far-seeing, had granted permission — Far from gold-sworded Demeter, the goddess of harvests resplendent, While with her comrades she played, the deep-bosomed daughters of Ocean, Gathering flowers, the rose, and the crocus, and violets lovely Over the meadows soft, the hyacinths too and the iris,

With the narcissus which Gaea, as snare for the flower-faced maiden, Planted by counsel of Zeus, the Many-receiver to favour.
Wondrously radiant it bloomed, a miracle to the beholders;
Both unto mortal men and unto the blessed im-
mortals.
Out from its root there grew a hundred blossoming faces.
Sweetest odour it breathed, and all the wide heaven
above it,
All the Earth laughed with delight, and the billows salt of the Ocean.
She in delighted amaze her arms stretched forth for the plaything — Lo, before her the Earth yawned wide, and opened a chasm,
Straight through the Nysian Plain, and forth from it
Lord Polydegmon Dashed with his coursers immortal, the many-named scion of Cronos, Seizing the maid unwilling, away in his chariot golden Bore her — In piercing shriek of terror her voice she uplifted,
Calling on Father Cronides, most high of the gods, most holy.

But of immortals none to the cry of Persephone hearkened;

Nay, nor of mortal men, nor even the rich-fruited olives.

Only Persaeus' daughter in light-hearted idleness playing,

Hecate radiant-stoled, the wild cry heard from her grotto.

Helios heard it as well, Hyperion's glorious offspring,

Heard the girl calling her father Cronides, but he far-abiding,

Far from the concourse of men in his prayer-thronged temple was sitting,

Offerings holy and fair from mankind mortal receiving.

Sore then against her will, by permission of Zeus
 he conveyed her,

He her own father's brother, Dictator, Receiver of many,

Far with his coursers immortal, the many-named scion of Cronos.

While then the maiden divine the earth and the firmament starry

Still could discern, and still the fish-teeming current
 of Ocean,

Still see the rays of the Sun, and hope her reverend mother

Once more to greet, and the troops of the deities ever existing, —

So long her heart was beguiled with hope, though broken with anguish,

So long the peaks of the hills. and the depths of ocean reëchoed

Loud her immortal cry — and her reverend mother heard her.

Then sharp anguish clutched her heart and with quivering fingers

Wildly she tore the veil which covered her tresses ambrosial.

Quickly o'er both her shoulders she flung a mantle of sable;

Then like a bird sped forth in her search over earth and ocean.

Yet to reveal the truth no god and no mortal consented,

Nor from the omens of birds true messenger came with the tidings.

Nine days then over Earth, with blazing torches to guide her

Held in her hands, in her quest the queenly Deo had wandered.

Ne'er in her grief she consented to taste the immortal ambrosia,

Ne'er the sweet draught of the nectar; nor suffered the waters to bathe her.

Now when the tenth bright dawn at last came to visit the goddess,

Hecate, holding her torch, came to meet her and thus spake tidings:

‘ Queenly Demeter, who bringest the seasons with splendid abundance,

Who of the heavenly gods, or who of mankind can have wronged thee,

Stealing Persephone fair, and grieving thy spirit beloved?

Lo, I have heard her cry, although with mine eyes
I beheld not

Who it might be; so I come to tell the story unerring.’

Thus did Hecate speak, but the daughter of fair-haired Rhea

Answered her not a word, but swiftly, with her as companion,

Darted in search — and high in her hand the torches
uplifted.

Helios first they sought, the watchman of gods and of mortals,:

And, by his chariot standing, the goddess divine made question:

‘ Helios, show me compassion, a goddess divine, if I ever

Either by word or deed thy heart and thy mind may have gladdened.

Lo the sweet blossom I bore, the maiden of beauty
 enchanting,
Hers was the voice of lament I heard through the waste of the Ether,
As of one ravished away, although with mine eyes
 I beheld not.
But, for that thou with thy rays from aloft in the heavenly Ether,
All upon Earth and Sea beneath thee ever beholdest,
Tell me the truth of my child, if anywhere thou hast perceived her.
Who by compulsion hath snatched her unwilling away from her mother?
Who of the gods immortal, or who of mankind hath essayed it? '
Thus spake Demeter — and he, Hyperion's son made answer:
' Daughter of fair-haired Rhea, Demeter, oh Sovereign Lady,
This shalt thou know, for greatly I reverence thee
 and I pity,
When I behold thee grieving for loss of thy daughter fair-ankled.
None of gods else, 'tis Zeus Cloud-Gatherer only is guilty.
To his own brother, to Hades, he granted the maiden, to call her

Fair-blooming bride henceforth; but he, to the regions of darkness, Far to his misty realm, bore the maid in his chariot, shrieking.' ”

The sun god strives to comfort Demeter by dwelling on the glory of a marriage with the great god of the world below; but Demeter refuses to listen, and, departing from the haunts of the gods, she roams in disguise throughout the cities and haunts of men. At last she reaches Eleusis, the home of King Celeos.

“ Then by the wayside sat, her heart nigh breaking with anguish,
Near to the well of the Maids, where the townsfolk came for their water,
Sat in the shade, — and above her there grew a fair bower of olive —
Like to an ancient dame who has passed the season of bearing,
Henceforth far from the gifts of Lover-of-wreaths Aphrodite.
Such are the nurses of sons of kings, who administer justice,
Such, through the echoing halls of their palaces,
house-keepers stately.
Her then beheld the daughters of Celeos, son of Eleusis,

Coming to fetch the water fair-streaming, that so they might bear it, Bear it in buckets of bronze to the house of their father beloved.
Goddesses four as it were, fair maidenhood's flower possessing,
Callidicé and Cleisidicé and Demo the lovely,
Callithoé as well, the eldest of all the sisters."

The ladies fail to recognize the goddess, but address her with courtesy, bidding her welcome to the palace. She answers with a fictitious tale to the effect that she has wandered hither in flight from a band of pirates who carried her from Crete. Her name is Dos, and she would gladly take service in the palace as nurse or sempstress. Callidicé answers with a brief account of the royal house, and proposes to run home and suggest to her mother, Metaneira, that the stranger be employed as nurse for their baby brother.

" Thus spake the maid. The goddess assented, —
so quickly their vessels Filled with the sparkling water, they bare to the palace, exulting.
Quickly the house of their father they reached, and straight to the mother
All they had heard and beheld they related. She, without pausing,

Bade them return and summon the stranger at wages unstinted.

They, as the youthful deer and heifers in season of Spring-time

Over the meadows leap, with pasture their hunger contenting,

So did the girls, upholding the skirts of their dresses
enchanting,

Dart down the hollow path and round them the hair on their shoulders

Tossed as they ran, resembling the golden bloom of the crocus."

The goddess follows them to the palace, where she is courteously received. She sits silent and sorrowful, till at last the jests of the maid Iambé provoke a smile. The child Demophoön is given into her charge, and thrives "like a divinity," though it receives no mortal food. Demeter anoints it with ambrosia, and at night buries it in the ashes of the hearth. One night she is surprised by Metaneira, who shrieks and protests. The goddess in disgust declares that the process of rendering the child immortal has been interrupted; but she consents to promise him all earthly blessings, because he has slept in the arms of the mighty goddess whom she now confesses herself to be. Meanwhile the poor child is lying neglected on the floor.

“ Then ¹ was the pitiful cry of the infant heard by the sisters.
Down from their well-spread couches they leaped,
and one of the maidens,
Taking the babe in her arms, did soothe it to rest in her bosom.
Kindled a fire a second, and, forth from the sweet-scented chamber,
Hastened on delicate feet a third in quest of her mother.
Gathered about him they bathed him, and coaxed him all helplessly gasping.
Ah, but the heart of the child refused to be won by their petting,
Far less skilful the nurses who tended him now and caressed him! ”

In the morning the king gave instructions to build a temple as commanded by the goddess. Therein she dwelled a whole year far from the blessed gods, “ pining with longing for her slim-waisted daughter.” A dreadful famine visited the earth, until Zeus, in apprehension lest the race of men perish utterly, sent Iris to Eleusis to entreat the goddess to come forth from her seclusion. Demeter remained obdurate, and at last Hermes was despatched to Hades. Permission was granted Proserpine to return to her mother; but Pluto

craftily induced her to eat a few seeds of pomegranate, " that she might not remain all her days beside the reverend dark-robed Demeter."

" Then ¹ she mounted the car, and beside her the Slayer of Argus,

Seizing the reins and the goad, sped forth from the palace of Hades.

On dashed the coursers eager, and quickly the journey accomplished.

Nor could the sea, nor waters of rivers, nor grass-covered valley,

Stay the rush of the horses immortal, nor rocks of the mountains.

Over them all in their flight they cut the deep air
as they hastened,

Halting at last where she, Demeter, their coming awaited,

Seated in front of her temple all sweet with the odour of incense.

When she beheld her daughter, she dashed like a Maenad to meet her,

As it had been a Maenad o'er mountain dark with the forest.

But when Persephone saw the beauteous eyes of her mother,

Down from the chariot leaping, she ran, and with tender embraces

Fell on her neck; — but the goddess, while yet her arms were about her, Boded some crafty deceit, and terribly fell she to trembling —
All the endearments were checked, and quickly her daughter she questioned:
' Child, hast thou tasted of food in the region below abiding?
Speak, nor the truth conceal, that we both may know it together.
So mayest thou forsake the loathed kingdom of Hades
Dwelling with me and thy father the cloud-wrapped offspring of Cronos, Henceforth held in esteem of all the blessed Im-
mortals.
But if it prove thou hast eaten, to earth's dread caverns returning,
All the third part of the year henceforth thou art
doomed to abide there,
Dwelling by me for the rest, and among the other Immortals.
Then, when the Earth shall bloom with sweet-smelling flowers of Spring-time, Forth from the misty gloom of the regions of darkness infernal,
Once more a marvel mighty, thou risest to men and Immortals.' "

Proserpine confesses that her husband has constrained her to eat of the pomegranate, and describes the event of her carrying off. Mother and daughter converse a long time with mutual satisfaction, and Zeus requests Rhea to descend to the Rarian Plain, and to ratify in his name the compact by which Demeter is to return to the converse of the gods, and to enjoy the society of her daughter for eight months in the year. Rhea carries the message, and Demeter consents.

“ Quickly ¹ she caused to spring the fruits of the deep-soiled pastures,
All the broad Earth was covered with leaves and blossoming flowers.
Then to Triptolemus King, and Diocles smiter of horses,
Mighty Eumolpus as well, and to Celeos, Lord of the people, Showed she the doing of rites, and the mystical orgies’ performance.
Mysteries holy no mortal may violate, mysteries secret
None may divulge — the awe of the gods the speaker constraineth. —
Blessed is he who hath seen, oh blessed of Earth-dwelling mortals!

He who the rites knoweth not, who hath missed them, shall destiny never Bless with his fellows — but lost he abides in the gloom and the darkness.”

We saw the well of Callichorus — Fair Dances — whence the daughters of King Celeos were wont to draw water, and where they met the Awful Dame as she sat wearied and comfortless. Here, before temples and halls existed for the formal celebration of the rites, they danced and sang in honour of the goddess:

“ He ¹ shall see,
Beside the fountain of Callichorus,
The torch that witnesseth the holy eikad ²
By night his vigil keeping.
When too the star-eyed ether of Zeus Joineth in the sacred dance,
Danceth too the moon,
And Nereus’ fifty daughters,
Who weaving their steps through Ocean’s halls
And eddyings of rivers ever-flowing,
With their dances celebrate
The gold-crowned maid
And the holy mother dread.”

² The 20th Boedromion, the night of the march from Athens.

It was now time to return to Athens, so we mounted our wheels and proceeded along the Sacred Way. Clouds had gathered, and the placid waters of the bay on our right had become ruffled by a rising wind, which made progress slow as we swept round the curve where the road bends at the Rheitoi to enter the pass of Daphne.

The Rheitoi are large pools of salt water, the fish of which were reserved exclusively for the Priests of the Goddesses. The ancients fancied that these lakes derived their waters from the Euboean straits, through a channel flowing under Attica. The Rheitoi formerly marked the boundary between the domains of Athens and those of Eleusis when the latter was an independent state; and near by was the monument of Eumolpus, ancestor of the priestly family of Eleusis.

Eumolpus came from Thrace. He was the son of Poseidon and Chione — the snow — and grandson of Boreas, the North Wind, and of Oreithyia — her who rushes madly over the mountains. After the fight between Eumolpus and Erechtheus, King of Athens, Eleusis became subject to the greater city, while Eumolpus obtained the office of high priest of the Mysteries. Such is the story told by Pausanias. Apollodorus says Eumolpus was slain; for the oracle revealed to Erechtheus that he would be victorious if he would sacrifice his daughter. He slew the youngest, Chthonia, whereupon her sisters slew themselves. A fragment from the lost Erechtheus of Euripides gives the words in which Praxithea, wife of Erechtheus, devotes her child to death. "In stout-hearted wise, not unworthy of her city and of being daughter of Cephisus."

"But ¹ I will give my daughter dear to death.
And many things I ponder — first the State.
A better one than this no man can find.
Where, first, the people come not from abroad,
But from the soil we spring, while other states,
Founded as if by random fall of dice,
Are filled with immigrants from divers lands.
Now he who goes from one State to another
Like some ill-fitting joint in carpentry
In name's a citizen, but in deed not so.
And then 'tis for this end we children bear,
That we may guard our land and altars safe. . . .
Now if at home instead of sheaf of girls,
A male crop flourished, and the blaze of war
Assailed the State, should I not send them forth
To war, because forsooth I feared for them? . . .
But when a mother's tears speed forth her sons,
They oft make soft the hearts attuned for fight.
I hate those women who prefer mere life
For their own children, rather than the Right;
So counsel ill — and more, when men in war
Fall amid many, they a common tomb

And glory shared attain, while her, my child,
Dying alone, alone the State shall crown,
And me and her two sisters she shall save.
What of all this is not a precious boon?
Her who is no wise mine, save by mere birth,
I sacrifice for fatherland; for if
The city fall, what portion will remain
To me of offspring? Thus my duty done,
Others may rule, but I shall save the State.
And this — whereof the greatest share to all
In common is — no man, with my consent,
Our ancient laws ancestral shall o'erthrow,
Nor, for the Olive and the Gorgon gold,
The Trident stand upon our fortress, crowned
By King Eumolpus and the Thracian horde,
And Pallas nowhere held in reverence . . .
Oh Country, would that all who in thee live,
Might love thee e'en as I; then should we dwell
In safety, and no harm should'st thou endure! "

Swinburne's *Erechtheus*¹ contains a paraphrase of this fragment of Euripides. His beautiful poem is one of the most essentially Euripidean plays in existence. Through the whole speech of Praxithea, we hear an echo of the conflict for the land of Attica between Athene and Poseidon, as it is depicted on the western pediment of the Parthenon.

As the road began to rise at the entrance of the pass of Daphne, we dismounted and turned to look westward for a parting view of the bay and plain. Far in the distance we could see the long ridge of legend-haunted Cithaeron, and south of it, the rounded mass of Geraneia. Our thoughts turned to the solemn hour when, after the Athenians took refuge in Salamis, and the Attic land was ravaged, Dicaeus and Demaratus, Athenian and Spartan exiles high in honour at the Persian court, found themselves "In ¹ the Thriasian Plain, when they beheld a cloud of dust moving from Eleusis, as it were of three myriads of men. And they wondered at the dust-cloud, from what men it rose; when straightway they heard a voice, and the voice seemed to them to be that of the mystic Iacchus. Now Demaratus was unskilled in the rites which are celebrated at Eleusis and asked Dicaeus what this sound might be. Dicaeus replied: ' Oh Demaratus, it is not possible but that some mischief is in store for the army of the king. For this is clear that, now that Attica is deserted, this which makes the sound is something divine advancing from Eleusis, to take vengeance in behalf of the Athenians and their allies. And if the cloud light on the Peloponnesus, there is danger at hand for the king and his army on the land; but if it turn to the ships in Salamis, the king will be in danger of losing his naval host. And the Athenians keep this festival yearly in honour of the Mother and the Maid, and he who wills, of the Athenians or of other Greeks, is initiated. And the sound thou hearest is the Iacchic cry they raise at the festival.' To this Demaratus answered: 'Be silent, and tell this tale to no man else. For if these words be carried to the king, thou shalt surely lose thy head, and I shall not be able to save thee, nor any other of mankind. But keep silence, and the gods will provide for the army.' Such was his advice, and from the dust and the voice arose a cloud which floated toward Salamis to the host of the Greeks. So they learned that the army of Xerxes was destined to perish."

As we climbed the pass, we noticed the deep ruts worn in the rocky Sacred Way by the wheels of centuries. On the left is the ancient sanctuary of Aphrodite with its innumerable niches for votive offerings. We could fancy the processions pouring through the pass, the light of their torches "all night long" reflected from the rocks on either side. At last we reached the monastery and church at the top of the pass, and remounted for the long descent to the olive-planted plain of the Cephisus. Athens burst upon our view illuminated by a western sun, and after a descent of more than a mile, we reached level ground and the famous crossing of the Cephisus. This was the scene of the "Gephyrismoi" or Bridge-jokes which formed a feature of the sacred processions, recalling the jests of the maid Iambé which first evoked smiles from the broken-hearted mother.

From the bridge to Athens, the way led us past the Botanical Gardens, and we entered the city near the Dipylon.

CHAPTER IV

AEGINA

ON a bright morning in early March, we embarked at the Piraeus on the small steamer Argo for her first trip of the season. A stiff Norther was blowing, and the snow-white clouds, sailing across the blue of the sky, were repeated in the white caps of the still bluer sea. The little steamer sailed out of the quiet harbour, past the headland of Munychia, and soon was in the tumbling sea of the Saronic Gulf. As she "ran over the billows accomplishing her course," the three mountains which curtain the Attic Plain receded, and the Peloponnesian shore grew more and more distinct. Across our bow passed a tossing brig bound seaward with all her sails set and filled by the blasts which swept down from Parnes. Here and there tiny fishing boats could be seen with gunwales awash, their crews often consisting only of an old man and a boy. Salamis lay to our right, its central mountain rising sharply in the background, while its coast stretched low, hard, and utterly barren.

As the Island dropped astern, we read the account of the battle of Salamis from the Persians of Aeschylus:

*Messenger:*¹ " The Gods preserve the goddess Pallas' town."

Atossa: " Then is the Athenians' city still unspoiled? "

Messenger: " For so her men live, safe her walls abide."

Atossa: " But how began the conflict of the ships? Who first adventured, was it Greeks, the fray, Or, boasting of his myriad ships, my son? "

Messenger: " Mistress, the spring of all this misery Was some Avenger or some angry God.
For, from the Athenian host a Greek arrived,
And to thy son, King Xerxes, tidings spake:
To wit, that if night's blackness should arrive,
The Greeks would stay not, but upon their decks
Leaping in panic, seek their lives to save
By secret flight, one here, one there afar.
Now Xerxes heard, yet, marking not the trick
Of Greek informer, nor ill-will of Heaven,
To all his captains proclamation makes:
When Helios lighting with his rays the Earth Shall cease, and gloom the Ether's temple hold,
To range the throng of ships in triple lines
To guard all exits and the seaward paths;

Others he bade round Ajax' Isle to wheel;
For if the Grecians should escape their doom
By finding hidden loophole for their ships,
Beheading was to all the stern decree.
So much he spake with heart too much at ease,
For naught of Heaven's decree he understood.
But they, in order due and discipline,
Made ready supper, and each sailor skilled Looked to his oars, his tholes, and all his gear.
But when the light of sun had passed away
And night approached, each master of the oar,
Each warder of the tackle took his post,
And rank to rank of warships cried the word.
And as to each the post had been assigned,
They sailed, and all night long the captains kept Manoeuvring the entire naval host,
And night advanced, nor yet a Grecian ship
Had anywhere attempted secret flight.
But when Aurora, with her coursers white,
Held all the Earth, fair-shining to behold,
An echoing shout first sounded from the Greeks
Like song of joy, and, at the instant, loud
The answer echoed from the Island Cliff,
And dread on all the host barbaric fell,
Their hopes frustrated, — Not as if for flight
The Grecians hymned their holy paean then,
But as to battle roused with courage stout;
And all the coast blazed with the cry of trump.
Then straightway with the clash of dashing oar,

They smote the watery brine at order given,
And swiftly all were plainly in our view.
The right at first led on in line of war
In goodly order, then the fleet entire Followed, and at the moment one might hear
A mighty cry: — ‘ Oh sons of Greeks, advance!
Deliver your ancestral soil, your sons
And wives set free, and shrines of tribal gods,
And tombs of forefathers! The Stake your All! ’
From our side too, the roar of Persian tongue
Leaped in response; and now delay was past.
And straightway ship ’gainst ship her brazen beak
Dashed — and a Hellene prow the shock began,
And from a Punic ship the figurehead
Broke off entire, and then, one here, one there
Her stem directed — Now the Persian host
At first withstood, but soon the throng was pressed
In narrow strait, and mutual aid was naught.
But, by their own bronze-armoured beaks assailed,
The line complete of oarage swift was crushed.
In circle round, the Grecian ships their blows
Not heedlessly inflicted, till the hulls
O’erturned, concealed the reddened sea beneath,
Covered with wreck of ships and blood of men,
The shores around and reefs with corpses piled.
Then, in disordered flight each ship was rowed,
So many as were left of Persian host.
But they, as ’twere some tunny shoal, the foe
With splintered oars and wreckage fragments smote,

And tore to shreds the wretches, while their groans
And shriekings covered all the briny sea,
Till night's dark eye concealed the horrid scene.
But, to recount to thee the sum of woe
I could not, if I spake for ten full days.
For know this well, that on a single day,
Never so vast a host of mortals died."

The Argo was by this time approaching the cliffs of Aegina, and she soon rounded the black spire of rock which rises from a ledge running out into the sea at the northeastern corner of the island. This is doubtless one of the many reefs planted by King Aeacus as a protection against pirates, as we are told by Pausanias. The black spire is all that is left of the mound built at his father's bidding by Telamon, that he might stand thereon and plead defence for his part in the murder of Phocus.¹

We dropped anchor in the little bay of Hagia Marina, and landed by rowboat. The clearness of the blue-green water and the purity of the white sandy bottom are remarkable even for the Aegean.

The island was named of old Oenone, the Island of the Vine, and the gnarled bushes, with no signs as yet of their verdure, covered every field and slope. The later name of Aegina points to Theban invasion. Aegina was the daughter of Asopus, god of the Boeotian river, and witness of the mighty battle of

Plataea, which finished on land the work begun on sea by Salamis. The River God married Metope — her of the fair forehead — and begat two sons and twenty daughters. Zeus loved and carried off the fairest of these, Aegina,¹ and when the father sought her sorrowing, the mighty god drove him back by the thunderbolt to his native banks,² and bore Aegina across the Saronic Gulf to Oenone. The island has borne since that time the name of the nymph, for she became the mother of Aeacus the Just, and ancestress of the mighty line from which Achilles sprang.

The goddess Hera took vengeance for the loves of Zeus and Aegina upon the inhabitants of the place. Ovid describes the pestilence which depopulated the island in language which reminds us of Thucydides, Boccaccio and Defoe. Aeacus in despair prayed to Panhellenian Zeus of the great temple on the mountain:

“‘Oh ³ Jupiter,’ I prayed, ‘if fables be not false which say thou didst embrace Aegina, daughter of Asopus, and if thou takest not shame, mighty father, to be called my parent; then give me back my people, or hide me too in the grave.' Zeus gave a token by lightning-flash with thunder following — 'I accept,' I cried, 'and be this a happy sign of thy intentions! I take as pledge the omen thou givest me.' Hard by there chanced to stand an oak, with far-spreading branches. Sacred to Jove it was, and sprung from Dodonaean seed. On this I beheld corn-gathering ants in long array carrying in tiny mouths enormous burdens and keeping their straight path upon the wrinkled bark. I noted the vast number and exclaimed: 'So many citizens give me, oh mighty father, and fill my empty walls.' The tall oak quivered, and uttered a sound from its branches which were shaken though by no breeze. My limbs stiffened with quaking fear, and my hair stood ereet. Yet gave I kisses to the Earth and to the tree trunk. I dared not say I hoped; but hope I did, and cherished in my heart my longings. Night fell, and sleep possessed my limbs with sorrow worn. Lo, before mine eyes that same oak seemed to stand, those branches, and it carried creatures on the branches in number as before, and in like manner it seemed to shake and scatter upon the field beneath the grain-laden throng. When suddenly, lo, they grew, and became ever taller and taller to look upon, and lifted themselves from the ground and stood with form erect. They cast off their tiny size and many feet and dark hue, and clothed their limbs in shape of men. My slumber left me, and my waking thoughts rejected the vision I had seen. I cried in anguish that there was no help in heaven. When lo, a great sound arose in the halls. I seemed to hear men's voices long unwonted. But while I fancied this too must be dreaming, lo Telamon rushed in and cried, 'Oh father, thou shalt see things too great for hope or credence. Come forth!' I came, and just such men as I had seemed to see in my dream, just such in rank I saw and recognized."

The new population were called Myrmidons¹ and retained in subsequent days the habits of gallant industry of their ancestors. Aeacus became so famous for the efficacy of his prayers that once when Greece was afflicted by famine, the oracle at Delphi declared that deliverance might be obtained if Aeacus would offer prayer in behalf of the land: "And² when Aeacus prayed, Greece was freed from her fruitlessness, and after his death he was honoured in the realm of Pluto and he guards the keys of Hades."

Donkeys met us at the landing rock, and for half an hour, the rugged path wound under the pines up the hillside spangled with anemones — flowers of the wind indeed. At the top of the hill stands the old Doric temple of Aphaea.³ Aphaea was a nymph of

² Apollod., iii. 12. 6. 10.

³ Athene has of late been dethroned by the archæologists.

Artemis-Dictynna, and used to dwell in Crete. Shunning the love of Minos, she fled for nine long months through mountain, forest, and morass, and at last in despair, leaped from a crag into the sea. A fisherman named Andromedes rescued her in his net,¹ and carried her in his skiff to Aegina. He too offered the cold nymph his love, and once more the flight began from this new pursuer. At last she vanished in the sacred grove which crowns the temple hill, and from her disappearance² comes her name Aphaea.

We lunched among the ruins of the temple. Noon was upon the Aegean, and the "brilliant wind" blew from the shore with the vigour of a New England Norther. The air was so clear that far Belbina could be plainly seen. Landward lay the smiling fields and olive groves, the scattered farmhouses, and the pine-clothed hills of Aeacus' ancient kingdom.

Aeacus left his throne to judge the spirits in the world below, assessor of Minos and Rhadamanthus, so righteous had been his peaceful sway in this happy island. But righteousness and peace soon fled from the hills and valleys. The strife of brethren brought about the first migration. Peleus and Telamon, sons of Aeacus, were worsted in the sports by their brother, Phocus; and plotting his death

together, they cast lots to see who should be the fratricide. Telamon, at the discus-throwing, hurled his quoit at Phocus with fatal aim, and with his guilty brother hid the body in the forest. But the deed became known, and the just king banished his unworthy sons. Telamon fled to Salamis where the childless king, Kychreus, was ruling a desolate island. For a dreadful serpent was ravaging the fields and destroying the folk. Telamon slew the monster, and received the throne as his inheritance. He prayed to Zeus for a male child, and lo, an eagle appeared to him as a sign from heaven. When the boy was born he was named Aias. For Aietos signifies Eagle, and Aias is none other than the mighty Ajax of the Trojan story. But Aegina remained without a king for ever, for the sons of the murdered Phocus fled to Parnassus, and bestowed their father's name upon the land of Phocis.¹

The centuries witnessed the incessant strife against the great city across the Gulf, until this "eyesore," as the proud Athenians named it, fell at last and its inhabitants were altogether driven out. Yet these early Aeginetans had been men of no mean stock. The pottery they fashioned was used in Italy and Egypt, and in the Euxine towns. Their coins passed current in the markets of the world, the talent of Aegina long continuing to be known more widely than even the Solonic talent of Athens,¹ and it was Aegina's fleet that earned the prize for valour in the fight at Salamis. When evil days came to the conquering state, and the power of Athens fell at Aegos Potami, some scanty remnant of the Aeginetan race returned to the ancestral island; but the old glory never returned, and through the ages which history leaves hidden in darkness from our eyes, the mingled stock seems gradually to have been reduced to the handful who inhabit the island to-day.

Aegina was a favourite theme with Pindar:

“ Land ² of the long oars, fatherland, Aegina server

By the side of Zeus the guardian of Strangers,
More than all mankind is honoured with observance.
For a matter weighty, many ways inclining
Rightly to adjudge, and not with false proportion,
Is a problem hard to overthrow by wrestling.

Nor may the years in their flight

The temple has been shorn of its chief glory —

they faced the foe. This was before the world had learnt so much about archaic sculpture and the work of the predecessors of Phidias. Yet perhaps the fancy was not wholly untrue. However that may be, we cherished the old thought as we looked up at the gray architraves now robbed of their crowns. The columns stand high and clear in the brilliant sunshine, and we strolled among them, placing ourselves to get vistas now of Argolis, now of Geraneia, Cithaeron, Parnes, and at last of Athens with the golden Acropolis, and Pentelicus rising behind, with Hymettus and its foothills east and south to Sunium.

These lesser ruined temples of Greece offer little perhaps of grandeur or of architectural splendour to the eye. It is to the heart they speak, and that most surely they do — every one of them. They are so truthful, so sincere. The effect is produced with so little effort of elaboration. The Colonnade, the Fore-house, the Cella, the Rear-house, that is all. Every trace of ornament has disappeared, and all colour save the glow of pink and gold and gray which time has bestowed instead of man's devices. And the temples are nobly placed. They look forth from headland or from hill-top, over island-studded gulf or fertile inland plain, simple and serene.

We filled our lungs with the wholesome cold March air, and descended with clean hearts and minds to the landing place once more. The Argo got up steam, and round the headland met the waves which by this time had become boisterous. She plunged valiantly into them, but we saw that it was going to be slow work to reach a point where the influence of the windward shore would give relief. “Ἐὶθ’ ὤφελ’ Ἄργους μὴ διαπτᾶσθαι σκάφος!” Far to the left rose Acrocorinthus and the Arcadian mountains. The Argo struggled on past the little islands which stud the Saronic, till at last Salamis offered a lee, and we ran past Psittaleia and Cynosura¹ — on into the quiet waters of the Bay of Salamis.

We turned before reaching the narrows, and saw in the distance the navy-yard where the modern Greek fleet lay at anchor. It consisted of but a handful of gunboats, but it was sufficient doubtless to have scattered all the hosts of Persia by a few broadsides. To the north rose the “Rocky brow that looks o’er seaborne Salamis.” To the south, the Island in its immortal glory, lit by the last ray of the setting sun.

“Paths² of the dashing sea surge, caves by the ocean’s edge, grove on the promontory’s brow,” mourned Ajax of his “long-time exile round the walls of Troy,” his dying thoughts turning to the beloved island home.

“The³ son of Telamon, in prosperity swaying

Salamis, founded where the sea floweth round." But Ajax, the mighty, Ajax, the heir of Salamis fell, as strength so often falls overcome by wit, and as in after days, the rugged Salaminians fell under the sway of clever Athens and Solon the Wise. Yet Athens in her glory never forgot the shelter which the Island gave in her hour of need. Always in her navy was a "Salaminia" used for highest and holiest purposes. And The Sea Fight needed no special name, when it was used to point the exhortations of the great orators in the days when Grecian liberty was once more threatened, and sinking to its end on the fatal plain of Chaeronea.

Psittaleia, the island of massacre, where Persia's noblest were slaughtered like cattle in a pen, was lighting its beacon as we rounded the northern end, and headed across for Piraeus.

"There¹ is an island fronting Salamis,
Small — a mean roadstead offering for ships.
Dance-loving Pan oft treads its ocean verge.
Thither the king his noblest sends, that when
The routed foe for refuge seek the isle,
They smite the Grecian host, an easy prey,
And friends may rescue from the ocean paths.
The future ill discerning, — for when Heaven
To Greeks the glory gave in fight of ships,
Their bodies clad in armour of good bronze,

At once they leaped to shore from off the decks,
And circled the whole island, nor our chiefs
Knew where to turn for safety, for in showers
They pelted them with rocks, and, from the bow,
The arrows pouring wrought destruction swift.
At last, in one fierce rush the Greeks dashed on,
They smote, they hacked their wretched victims'
limbs,

Until they reft the life from all the band.
When Xerxes saw the depth of ill, he groaned,
For on a throne conspicuous to the host,
He sat, on mountain brow near ocean's brine.
Rending his robes, he cried in loud lament,
And, leaving to his host on land the fight,
In flight unseemly thence he rushed. — Such woe
Is thine to weep for, added to the first."

CHAPTER V

MARATHON

WE made an early start from Athens, and after leaving the city, we quickly came to true pastoral country of a kind very characteristic of Greece. Attica for the most part is barren, but here we found meadows of soft grass as green as those in the fertile lands of the Peloponnesus. We passed flocks of sheep tended by handsome young bearded shepherds in cloaks of rough wool and carrying real crooks. They represented precisely one's idea of Meliboeus or Tityrus. The pastures were fields of grass of the type of good golf turf, dotted with clumps of furze bush or thistle, and covered with anemones of every colour. Here and there a gnarled olive tree offered a tempting spot, should Tityrus feel inclined to try his pipe.

We passed an occasional ruined church, or a new one situated in a group of three or four cottages with a modest inn, where the driver stopped to give water to his horses. Soon we crossed a low spur of Hymettus and began a long gentle descent through olives and pines. This part of the road is lonely but very beautiful. At one point we crossed a bridge and drove through a perfect tunnel of foliage. Pines, olives and vines, planted thick on either side, afforded shade, rare indeed in this land.

One of the favourite haunts of the great god Pan was near this spot. The stalactites in his cave bear, to this day, the forms of his goats, and he must have loved the Marathon region well. As Phidippides traversed the Arcadian mountains in quest of help for Athens, the god suddenly appeared before him. There is no panic terror now in his mild countenance, but good cheer, as he tells Phidippides that all will be well. For he himself — the resistless power of Nature — will be present at Marathon on the great day. And the Athenians, who had hitherto neglected his worship,¹ gave him in gratitude a shrine in the grotto on the northern slope of their own Acropolis.

We reached a wayside inn, where we changed horses, and rested half an hour. This spot is the scene of the last instance of kidnapping by brigands.² We had passed the Diacria, the high ground between Hymettus and Pentelicus, and from now on our road, for the most part, was a long slow descent, until we suddenly caught sight of the sea. Far to the northeast we saw the snow-clad Euboean mountains across the Euripus. To the southeast a low gray island was Ceos, the birthplace of Simonides, the poet whose name is associated with the war of which our minds were full, as we approached the scene of the first battle. Simonides wrote many epitaphs in honour of those slain in the Persian War.¹ In competition with Aeschylus — who had himself fought at Marathon — he composed an inscription for the famous picture by Mikon, Panaenus, and Polygnotus in the Painted Stoa of Athens.²

“ Fighting as champions for Greece on Marathon’s plain, the Athenians Low on the ground the might dashed of the gold bearing Medes.”

Here is the inscription offered by Aeschylus, but rejected as inferior to that of Simonides:

“ Men ³ of Plataea and Athens, on Marathon’s meadow embattled,
Low on the ground the might dashed of the gold-
bearing Medes.”

We wound up a hill scarred by the marks of a recent great conflagration, and at last far away, we could descry a broad plain shut in on three sides by hills, and washed on the fourth by the Euboean

³ Aeschylus: Elegy, i. Bergk.

Strait. This was Marathon; but, for the half hour of approach, our attention was held by the view of the mountains across the Strait which is here very narrow. Northeast, the promontory of Cynosura runs out from the mainland. It is curious that there should have been points of land with identical names at both Marathon and Salamis. Here the name "Dog's Tail" may recall Aelian's statement that in the above-mentioned picture of the Painted Stoa, there appears a dog, taken as "fellow soldier" to the battle by one of the Athenians. "Both ¹ are painted in the picture, the dog not being left unhonoured; for he obtained this meed for the danger he faced that he is to be seen together with Cynaegiros, Epizelos, and Callimachus."

Conspicuous in Euboea rises snow-crowned Dirphys. Simonides ² wrote an epitaph on the peasant lads who fell for their country:

" Under the slope of Dirphys we fell. This mound in our honour
Hard by Euripus stands, raised by our countrymen here.
Just was the tribute. We lost the early prime of our manhood,
We who holding our ground, met the rude cloud of the war."

² Simonides, 89 Bergk.

The road to Rhamnus runs north from the plain. Here stood the famous statue of Nemesis. For the Persians brought with them to Marathon a huge block of Persian marble, whereof to make a trophy in celebration of the expected victory. From this very bit of stone Phidias wrought the statue of the goddess, whose wrath had been stirred by their presumptuous confidence.¹

Upon reaching the edge of the plain of Marathon the carriage stopped at a group of farm buildings, and we alighted and proceeded to the mound which rises from the centre of the plain. This is the famous "Soros" heaped over the bodies of the Grecian dead, and while its genuineness has at times been disputed, archæologists have at last pronounced in its favour. In the fight, the Athenians were marshalled tribe by tribe, that friend might be encouraged by the proximity of friend; and so, tribe by tribe, the bodies of one hundred and ninety-two heroes were laid in this mound. Beside it, "Each night and all night long, one may hear the sound of champing horses and of fighting men."²

The Soros is the only elevation in the perfectly level plain, and we lunched under the shade of the clump of trees on its northern side.

Modern military critics have proved that Marathon was not much of a battle after all. It was merely a rear-end engagement with Persians who were already embarking. In the Greek imagination, however, it holds high place after Thermopylae, Salamis, and Plataea. For it was the first conflict, and as it turned out it led to a ten years' respite. We can hear throughout Greek oratory and poetry the echo of the exultant consciousness that from this first conflict between Slave and Free, Liberty came forth triumphant.

In the Persians of Aeschylus, Queen Atossa asks the chorus for information concerning these strange Athenians:

*Atossa:*¹ " Tell me, who is their commander, who is despot o'er the folk? "

Chorus: " Of no mortal man the servants, nor the subjects are they called."

Atossa: " How then could they bide the onset of the foeman pressing hard? "

Chorus: " In such fashion that Darius saw his mighty host destroyed."

" The ² greatest orator of the ancient world swore ' by those who lay buried at Marathon,' as if they were gods, and no appeal was more inspiring to Athenian ears than that to the memory of those who fought at Marathon."

Pausanias ² tells us how the fight was depicted on the walls of the Painted Porch.

“ Of the Boeotians, those who dwelt at Plataea, and the whole of the Attic force, are advancing to close quarters with the barbarians. And in this part of the picture the fight is equal. But further on, the barbarians are fleeing and pushing one another into the swamp. And at the end of the picture are the Phoenician ships, and the Greeks killing the barbarians, who are rushing towards these. There is also painted the hero Marathon — from whom the plain has been named — and Theseus ³ is depicted like one rising from the Earth, and Athene and Heracles. For Heracles was regarded as a god by the Marathonians first, as they themselves say. And of the fighters, those most conspicuous in the picture are Callimachus,⁴ who had been elected Polemarch by the Athenians, and Miltiades of the generals, and the hero called Echetlos.” ⁵

⁵ Echetlos was the mysterious figure who appeared on the

We picked our way shoreward over the firmer parts of the marsh, and found a comfortable heap of dry seaweed on the beach, where we spent an hour enjoying the bright sunshine and the glorious view of the Euboean Strait. Herodotus was our guide. Off this very beach, Hippias, longing to recover the throne whence he had been expelled, "Guided¹ the ships of the barbarians, . . . and anchored them, and marshalled the Persian troops after they had disembarked on the shore. And as he was thus employed, it befell him to sneeze and cough more violently than was his wont, and as he was elderly, his teeth for the most part were shaken. So then he lost one of his teeth by the violence of his coughing, and as it had fallen upon the sand he used great diligence to find it. But as his tooth appeared not, he groaned and said to the bystanders: ' This land is not for us, nor shall we prove able to make it subject; for so much of it as was to have been my share, my tooth already has obtained. . . . '

The famous narrative runs on in the historian's delightful style of sober narrative, quaint anecdote, and historical digression. The unexpected arrival on the scene of the heroic Plataeans en masse must have cheered the hearts of the anxious Athenians. There is something quite touching in the almost romantic affection of the Athenians for their humble, oppressed Boeotian protégés; and the devotion of the Plataeans to the city that alone had helped them in their need, appears again and again in Grecian history. Herodotus, after telling of the arrival of the Plataeans, and after commenting on this ancient tie of friendship, describes the anxiety of the Athenian generals, and their patriotic self-abnegation and resolution at the last. We could follow, without difficulty, his description of the positions of the contestants, and the details of the fight.

“When¹ their dispositions were made, and the omens were propitious, . . . they rushed at full speed against the barbarians. . . . But the Persians, when they saw them approaching at a run, prepared as if to receive their onslaught. And they imputed madness to the Greeks, and a right fatal madness, when they saw them so few, and these pressing on at a run aided by neither cavalry nor archery. . . . And the Athenians, when they had joined in close conflict with the barbarians, then they fought in wise worthy of description. For they were the first of all the Greeks whom we know, who went at running speed against enemies, and the first who endured the sight of the garb of the Medes and the men clad therein. For before this, even the name of the Medes was a terror for the Greeks to hear."

We could picture to ourselves the temporary success of the Persians at the centre of the line, where they drove their opponents well towards the hills. Then our imagination recalled the Grecian wings victorious, the flight through the marshes, and the wild rush for the ships; the effort to set these on fire; Cynaegiros grasping the prow of a vessel, and falling, his arms severed by a battle axe; then the final retreat of the fleet round Sunium; the flashing shield signal given by traitors from mount Pentelicus; the hasty return of the Athenians to their city to thwart the treachery; — and finally, the arrival of help from Sparta when all was over.

The historian gives a dry account of the conduct of the Lacedaemonians. When Phidippides came with his agonized appeal, "It ¹ pleased the Spartans to send help to the Athenians. It was impossible, however, to do this at once, for they did not wish to transgress their custom. For it was the ninth day of the waxing moon, and they said that they would not go forth on the ninth day for that the disc of the moon was not full. So they awaited the full moon. . . . But after the full moon,² two thousand of the Lacedaemonians came to Athens, in hot haste to be in time, so that they reached Attica on the third day from Sparta. But though they had arrived after the collision, they desired nevertheless to gaze upon the Medes. So going to Marathon, they gazed. Then, commending the Athenians and their work, they departed homeward."

The fountain of Macaria mentioned by Pausanias is no longer to be found. Marathon had been the scene in mythical times of the brave deed of a woman who here offered her life that victory might be assured to Athens and that the race of Heracles might not perish. The Heraclidae of Euripides tells the story. The persecuted children of Heracles, fleeing from Eurystheus of Tiryns, reach Marathon, and beg protection of King Demophon, who now rules Attica as successor of his father Theseus. The king promises succour, and Eurystheus, seeing the prey about to escape, makes preparation for battle. An oracle declares that, as a condition of victory, a maiden, sprung of noblest stock, must be sacrificed to Demeter. Macaria, the eldest daughter of Heracles, surrenders herself to voluntary death. "Worthy of her father, worthy of her noble birth this deed hath been done. And if the death of the brave thou dost revere, I join with thee."¹

It was time to return to Athens. The day had been warm and bright, but in March there is always a sharp chill in the air when the sun begins to approach the horizon. As we drew near Athens, the Acropolis rose clear against the glory of the western sky, and the lights of the city shone forth one by one as we entered the suburbs.

CHAPTER VI

CORINTH

FROM Eleusis to Corinth the scenery is very beautiful. The railroad skirts the sea during nearly the whole of its course, often creeping along the edge of cliffs or crossing deep clefts in the rocks with the waves actually roaring beneath the train. Usually, however, this part of the Saronic Gulf is calm, and from the windows of the railway carriage one looks down through limpid blue-green to the clean sandy bottom far below.

After leaving Eleusis the line runs round the spur of the Kerata, through a very extensive olive plantation which reaches more than half the way to Megara. On the left is still the Bay of Salamis, now widening, now narrowing so much that a good swimmer might easily cross to the Island. Over the southwestern point of Salamis one begins to see Aegina and the far off Argolic mountains, and presently the train reaches Megara.

Megara was a Dorian town, and her enmity to Ionian Athens lasted almost unbroken through historic times. The final acquisition of Salamis by Athens was something which Megara could not forgive; and the famous Megarian Decree of commercial non-intercourse was one of the inflaming events which led to the Peloponnesian War. Aristophanes in the Acharnians gives a horrible picture of the sufferings caused by the Decree to the inhabitants of Megara, and repeats the unpleasant tale of the personal affair which led to the promulgation of the ordinance. Apologists of Pericles deny utterly the culpability of the great statesman, and prefer to follow the account of Plutarch,¹ according to whom the decree was issued because the Megarians had appropriated to profane uses a part of the sacred Eleusinian territory. The situation was exasperated by the treatment of the ambassador Anthemocritus, who was put to death by the Megarians. In consequence of this outrage, Charinus brought in a "decree against them, that there should exist enmity without truce and without parley, and that whatever Megarian should set foot on Attic soil, should be punished with death; and that the generals, on swearing the ancestral oath, should vow in addition that twice each year they would invade the Megarid." The Megarians in Plutarch's time denied the execution of Anthemocritus, and claimed that the version of Aristophanes was the true one.

Modern Megara is proud of its pure Hellenic blood in the midst of neighbours of Albanian stock. The Easter Monday dances are famous, and the beauty of the maidens justifies the claim of pure descent. From Megara the land slopes towards the ancient seaport of Nisaea over against Salamis. Here is the Rock Aithyia where Pandion lies buried, and opposite is the Rock Minoa. The names call to mind many sad legends of these early kings of Attica and the Megarid.

Pandion, driven from his home in Attica, took refuge here and married the daughter of King Pylas whom he succeeded. His sons recovered their paternal inheritance, and made division of the territory. The sad fate of his daughters belongs more properly to Daulia.¹ The third son, Nisus, became King of Megara, and when Minos, King of Crete, made his famous invasion, Nisus was besieged in his citadel on the Rock since called Minoa. The king's beautiful daughter, Scylla, became enamoured of Minos, and, induced by love or perhaps by gold, betrayed her father to the invader. Now Nisus bore a charmed life. On his head there grew a lock of purple hair, and while that was safe, no harm could befall him. Scylla entered the chamber where he slept, and, after cutting off the purple lock, she presented it to Minos, who in scorn and loathing rejected her appeals and sailed away in his ships. Scylla in despair leaped into the sea, and strove to cling to the ship of the departing Minos. But her murdered father, changed into a sea eagle, appeared in pursuit, and Scylla was transformed into a strange new sea bird called Ciris.¹ Some say it was Minos who flung her into the sea, and that her body, which was washed ashore on the Argolic coast, gave the name to the Scyllaeon Promontory.²

The first hundred and fifty lines of the eighth book of Ovid's Metamorphoses give a beautiful version of the tale. Here is the brief account in the Choephoroe of Aeschylus, where the chorus of slave maidens in expressing detestation of the crime of Clytemnestra, recall similar instances of the dreadful deeds of passion done by women.

“ Another ³ woman we in legend needs must loathe, Scylla the murderous,
Who, by foes seduced, a dear one slew,
By Cretan gold-wrought necklace tempted, —
The Gift of Minos — and she severed
The lock immortal from the head of Nisus,
As in sleep he breathed unwitting —
Dog hearted woman!
But Hermes overtook her.”

After leaving Megara, the train begins to creep along the edge of the cliffs of Mount Geraneia.

² This Scylla is sometimes wrongly confused with the monster of the Straits of Messina.

³ Aesc.: Cheoph., 603.

This mountain is said to have received its name from the Cranes.¹

Megaros² was the son of Zeus and one of the Sithnid nymphs, whose stream supplied the fountain of Megara, adorned with buildings by the famous tyrant Theagenes — “a fountain worth seeing for its adornment and the number of its columns.”

Now once upon a time it befell Megaros “to escape from the flood of Deucalion to the height of Geraneia — the mountain not yet having this name. But forasmuch as he swam, directing his course by the cry of flying Cranes; on this account the mountain was named Geraneia.”

We crossed a bridge over a chasm of the sea, and began to descend faster towards the low land of the Isthmus. This bridge is at the Κακὴ Σκαλά, the Evil Staircase, which the ancients called the Scironian Cliff. We were pursuing in reverse direction the famous course of Theseus, whose twelve labours vie with those of Heracles. While the Megarians state that Sciron was the first to build the road along the Saronic Gulf, the accepted myth represents him as a cruel robber, who lived on the rocks of Megaris. He would compel³ travellers to wash his feet, and while they were stooping to perform the task, he would kick them over the cliff in sheer glee. A monstrous tortoise, lurking at the foot of the rock, devoured the bodies. Theseus visited him with the same treatment he had so often bestowed on others.

The Molurian Rocks are near those of Sciron. From them Ino leaped with her son Melicertes in her arms, and became the sea goddess Leucothea. Ino was daughter of Cadmus, and the second wife of Athamas. She¹ incurred the wrath of Hera for having nursed the infant Dionysus, her nephew. The goddess afflicted Athamas with homicidal madness directed against his own children. After seeing Learchus, her eldest boy, slain by his father, the frantic mother fled with Melicertes, and leaped with him into the sea, where they became divinities propitious to mariners. The² handmaidens of Ino traced her steps as far as the edge of the Cliff. Guessing the fate of their mistress, they made loud complaint of the cruelty of Hera. The goddess heard their outcry, and resolved to make one more example of her savage power. The maiden who had loved her mistress best tried to leap into the sea, when lo, she found herself powerless to move. Others, essaying to beat their breasts or tear their hair, found their arms grown rigid in the act. Others again were changed into birds, who, to this day, may be seen dipping their wings as they skim along the sea among the scattered rocks which once were living maidens.

Another account, given by Apollodorus,¹ represents Ino as having plotted the death of Phrixos and Helle, children of Athamas by his first wife, Nephele. Pausanias tells us that Melicertes was conveyed to Corinth by a dolphin. Others say that his body was washed ashore there. At all events, the famous Isthmian games were instituted in his honour. The Scholiast on Pindar² says that "The Nereids once upon a time in their dance appeared before Sisyphus,³ and bade him conduct the Isthmian festival in honour of Melicertes."

"Sisyphus,⁴ son of Aeolus, they bade,
In honour of the boy to institute
The prize of far renown for Melicertes perished."

We meet the new sea-goddess in a well-known passage of the Odyssey:

"Then⁵ the daughter of Cadmus spied him, Ino of the neat ankle, Leucothea, who of yore had been a mortal of human speech, but now, in depths of Ocean, the gods have bestowed honour upon her. She beheld with compassion the storm-driven Odysseus in his anguish, and in likeness of a flying gull she rose up from the sea. Then she seated herself on the raft, and spake words to him: ' Ill-fated one, wherefore hath Poseidon, Shaker-of-Earth, so sore afflicted thee with his wrath, in that he causeth for thee so many evils? Surely he shall not destroy thee, though he is greatly enangered against thee. But verily do thou act thus — for thou seemest to me not without wisdom — cast off thy garments, and leave thy raft to be carried by the winds, and, swimming with thy hands, strive to attain a haven on Phaeacian soil, where it is thy destiny to escape. Take then this veil, and spread it beneath thy breast. It is immortal, nor is there fear that evil or destruction befall it. When, therefore, thou shalt touch the land with thine arms, unbind the veil, and cast it again into the wine-faced sea, far from the land, and turn thyself backward.' When she had thus spoken, the goddess gave him the veil. Then she dove into the billowy sea, in likeness of a gull. And the dark waves covered her."

The Chorus in the Medea of Euripides compares the cruel mother to the maddened Ino.

*Chorus:*¹ " Unhappy one, of rock art thou or steel Thou that by murderous hand wilt slay
The crop of children thou thyself didst bear?

“Of one, one only have I heard
In ancient story.
Ino by gods distraught,
What time the spouse of Zeus
Drove her in wandering from her home afar.

“For impious murder of her sons
She falleth — hapless one — her foot extending O’er ocean cliff into the raging main.”

Simonides wrote an elegy on one wrecked on Geraneia and the Scironian Rocks.

“Ill-omened¹ cliff, mist-clad, Geraneia, would that on Ister
Or on the Scythian Don far thou directedst thy gaze.
Nor that at hand were found the Scironian billow
of ocean,
Bane of the maddened dame, near the Molurian Crag.”

As we journeyed westward, further legends of the prowess of Theseus came back to us. We were near the haunts of the Sow of Crommyon and of the robber Sinis, who hurled his enemies into the sea as from a catapult by fastening them to a bended pine. Theseus visited him with righteous retribution by fastening him to his own pine.

The coast of Argolis drew near, and the calm sea was almost glassy in its smoothness. We could see the snow-topped mountains reflected on the surface which the wildest storms cannot reach. Then came the Isthmus, and beyond it the same untroubled waters till, far to the westward, the Gulf of Corinth expanded and the mirrored picture came to an end.

Strabo ¹ tells us that the eastern end of the Corinthian Gulf was called the Halcyon Lake. No wonder the halcyon chose this spot for her nest on

“ The ² mild ocean,
Which now hath quite forgot to rave,
While birds of calm sit brooding on the charmed wave.”

We recall the words of Alcman:

“ Would,³ ah, would I were a king fisher,
Who, o’er the blossoming of the sea,
With halcyons flitteth
With heart enduring Sea-purple bird of the Spring!”

² Milton’s ode on the morning of Christ’s nativity.

.. . . .

Simonides sings of the halcyon:

“ As ¹ when the fourteen days in winter month
Zeus calmeth by his power;
And men on earth have named the time
The wind-forgotten hour —
Her holy nursing season good Hath then the Halcyon many-hued.”

The Isthmus is now pierced by a canal, and the isle of Pelops is really an island at last. The undertaking was begun by Nero and abandoned after a considerable amount of work had been done. Near the western end, a quaint little relief of the emperor is cut in the cliff.

The canal was finished in 1893, but is too narrow for the large Mediterranean steamers.

A Delphic oracle runs as follows:

“ Wall ² not the Isthmus nor dig;
An Island had he wished it, Zeus had made.”

Our train crossed the canal on a bridge. To the westward, one of the most beautiful panoramas in the whole of Greece was unfolded. The towering Acrocorinthus rose full in view and behind it the loftier heights of the Peloponnesus. Beyond Chel-

mos, glorious Cyllene lifted his crown of snow; and across the Gulf were the still more famous heights of Cithaeron, Helicon, and — mightiest of all — Parnassus. The Gulf slept in the sheltering arms of these guardian giants, and reflected the dazzling white of their summits, as it was gradually dulled to the mournful gray of their sides, and at last to the stern red of their sea-washed feet. The repose of the scene is seldom broken. Occasionally the tiny sail of a fishing boat can be seen, more rarely a coastwise steamer; but often there is no sign whatever of human life upon the whole expanse.

We left the train, and hastened through modern Corinth, which, save for the beauty of its situation, is in no wise noteworthy. The ancient city, too, until a few years ago, would have served only as a temporary resting place for those whose goal was the great fortress. Nothing was then visible except the venerable ruin of the Temple of Apollo, one of the oldest Doric temples in the world. Of late, however, the excavations conducted by the American School have brought to light much that is of interest. The once magnificent buildings of the fountain of Pirene have been discovered, and many other ancient sites have been excavated. Nearly everything, however, is in such ruin that a feeling of bewilderment is unavoidable. Perhaps also a slight disappointment is felt that a city so brilliant in all worldly aspects should have perished so utterly.

Dire indeed was the work of pillage to which the rich and wicked city became a victim when Grecian freedom fell with her at last.

The aged temple stands on high ground looking forth over the Corinthian Gulf. It is a very sad temple. When the rude soldiery of Mummius trampled underfoot all that was left of Hellenic independence and "The eye of Greece" was darkened, this venerable mother of temples had lived too long.

"Where¹ is thy beauty renowned through the world, Oh Dorian Corinth?

Where is thy battlement crown? Where thy processions of old?

Where are thy fanes of the blest, thy palaces, where are thy Matrons,

Sisyphus' daughters? Thy folk numbered by myriads once?

Ill-fated one! No trace, not one of thy glory is left thee.

All in one moment consumed, war hath devoured
the whole.

Only the Nereid nymphs, the daughters immortal
of ocean

Still unharmed we survive, Halcyon birds of thy

² Symonds' "Sketches and Studies of Italy and Greece" has a beautiful paraphrase of this lament.

We toiled up the steep slope of the Acrocorinthus, and at last reached the top and rested for our reward. The view was glorious. Not only can one gaze northward over the prospect we already know, but eastward spreads the Saronic with its islands, and far off on a clear day even the hill of Athens can be made out. South and west rise tier after tier of mountains, and at one's feet spreads the fertile plain running along the shore of the Gulf to ancient Sicyon.

One of the finest stories in Plutarch is the account of the capture by Aratus of the Acrocorinthus. "The¹ Acrocorinthus, a lofty mountain, growing up from the midst of Greece, when it is garrisoned, . . . renders its master supreme . . . so that the younger Philip, not in joke but truly, called the citadel of the Corinthians 'the Chains of Greece.' . . . Now the place had always been an object of contention to princes and potentates; and the eagerness of Antigonus for it fell short in no respect of the maddest of passions." Plutarch tells how Antigonus obtained the fortress by fraud, and prefaces his account of the recapture by reflections concerning the glory of the deed of Aratus as having been done in behalf of all Greece against a Macedonian foe, whereas the exploits of Pelopidas and Thrasybulus — to which he compares it — were done against Greeks in behalf of other Greeks.

There follows an account of the scene at the Bankers' in Sicyon where the brothers who had stolen some of the king's gold came to deposit their booty. Aratus was a friend of the banker, who had learned from one of the brothers of the existence of a hidden weak spot in the fortifications of the citadel. An agreement was made by which for a large bribe one of the thieves was to lead Aratus to this spot. An accident nearly ruined the whole plan. Technon, the servant of Aratus, had been sent to make a preliminary examination of the place, and meeting one of the brothers who knew nothing of the plot, revealed to him his errand. This brother proved a traitor, and was about to deliver Technon to the authorities, when the right brother appeared, and instantly perceiving the situation, made a sign to Tèchnon to flee. Technon leaped from the rock where he stood and escaped. Aratus, not daunted by this set-back to his plans, sent money to bribe the traitorous brother to silence, and having gained possession of his person, locked him in a dungeon for greater security. When all the preparations were complete, Aratus chose a band of four hundred followers who were ignorant of his purpose.

"It¹ was midsummer and the time of the full moon. The night was cloudless, and the flashing of the weapons, reflecting the rays of the moon, caused fear that they might not elude the garrison.

When, however, the leaders drew near, clouds ran up from the sea and covered the citadel itself and the region outside which became overshadowed." Bare-footed they climbed the ladders and slew the watchers at the wall. Plutarch describes the wild scene within the fortress; the awakened citizens, the trumpets, the moving torches, and the hand-to-hand combat. In one place, Aratus found himself bewildered in the dark windings among the rocks which had caused him to lose the road. Then the moon is said "in wondrous wise" to have dispersed the clouds and pointed out to him the path. No sooner had he regained it, than clouds collected and the shadows covered all once more. Again the combat raged with varying fortunes, but at last the liberators held the height just as the "day was beginning to glow, and the sun shone upon the task accomplished." Then the main body of the troops of Aratus arrived from Sicyon and the royal garrison were made prisoners. Plutarch goes on to describe the scene in the theatre in the city below, where the people thronged to see the victor and to hear his words. "He¹ advanced from his tent into the midst, armed, and with his countenance altered by reason of weariness and sleeplessness, so that the joy and exultation of his soul seemed overcome by the languor which depressed his frame. But when the people at his approach poured themselves out in congratulation, he took into his hand his spear, and leaning slightly upon it, he stood for a long time listening to their applause and shouts in praise of his valour and envy of his good fortune. And when they ceased, he collected himself, and delivered a speech in behalf of the Achaeans appropriate to his exploit, and bade the Corinthians adopt the Achaean cause as their own. Then he gave them the key of the gates now for the first time in their control since the times of Philip."

The walls of the Acrocorinthus were built and rebuilt, captured and recaptured, many and many a time during the dark ages of Grecian thralldom, and in the war which brought freedom at last. Churches and dwellings cover the enclosure, but of these there is little left but ruin. We descended into a cavern and drank the waters of Pirene, which supplied — so we are told — the great fountain building in the city below. Like Hippocrene on Mount Helicon, the fountain was created by the hoof of Pegasus who sprang hence to the sky. It was granted to Sisyphus for playing informer as is related in the annals of Aegina.¹

As the sun declined we reluctantly descended and, pausing for farewell to the mournful temple in the ancient town, we mounted our carriage and drove to modern Corinth for the night.

CHAPTER VII

MYCENAE

THE road from Corinth to Nauplia took us quickly from the coast, winding round the Eastern end of the Acrocorinthus, and passing the little village of Hexamilia. This town was the scene of charitable labours on the part of Dr. S. G. Howe, who here established a colony for the refugees who fled from Turkish cruelty in 1828.

Far to the left we could see the Arachnaean heights, the last station of the famous beacon signal on its journey from Troy to proclaim to the watchers on the palace of Agamemnon that the city had fallen at last.

*Chorus:*¹ “ And how could tidings with such speed have come? ”

Clytemnestra: “ Hephaestus sent from Ida his bright gleam;

And, torch succeeding torch, the courier fire
Sped hither — Ida to the Lemnian Crag
Of Hermes flashed the tidings. From the Isle,

Mount Athos caught the mighty beacon third.
Then, rising high to overarch the sea,
This joy-fraught strength of travelling torch sped on,
This pine knot, and like some gold-blazing sun
To watch upon Macistus bore the gleam —
Who loitered not o'ercome by heedless sleep,
But passed his portion of the tidings on.
The beacon's light to far Euripus came,
And signalled to Messapium's guards the news.
Answering the blaze, they urged the message on,
Kindling with fire a heap of withered brush.
In strength the glare with brightness still undimmed,
Leaping across Asopus' Plain, as 'twere
A shining moon, attained Cithaeron's crag,
And waked new relay of the envoy-fire.
Nor did the watch deny a far-sent beam,
But kindled one yet greater than before.
And over Lake Gorgopis darts the light
And hastening on to Aegiplanctus' Cliff,
Urges that meed of fire be not delayed.
Kindling with force ungrudged a mighty beard
Of flame they light, and send to pass beyond
The headland guarding the Saronic Strait
With blaze unfailing — Then it came and lodged
On Arachnaean steep, town-neighbouring heights.
Then here on the Atridae's roof it rests,
This light, true progeny of Ida's fire."

We traversed the domain of Cleonae, the rival of Corinth in early days, and wound through rugged passes among desolate towering cliffs, one of which contains a cave which we are told was the lair of the dreadful Nemean Lion. One of the twelve labours of Heracles imposed on him by his oppressor Eurystheus of Tiryns was to bring him the hide of the Lion of Nemea.

“ Now¹ this was an invulnerable monster begotten of Typhon. On his journey then in search of the lion, he came to Cleonae, and was entertained by the craftsman Molorchus. And when the latter would fain have offered a victim in sacrifice [Heracles] bade him wait till the thirtieth day; and if he should return safe from the hunt, to sacrifice to Zeus the Deliverer; but if he should perish, then to sanctify the victim to him as a hero. And having come to Nemea and sought out the lion, he first shot at it with arrows. But when he perceived that the beast was invulnerable, he lifted up his club and gave chase. And when the lion fled into a cave with two mouths, Heracles blocked up one entrance, and through the other he entered in pursuit of the beast, and throwing his arm around its throat, held squeezing fast until he choked it. Then he threw it across his shoulders, and fetched it to Cleonae. And finding Molorchus on the last of the days on the point of consecrating the sacrificial victim to him as dead, he offered sacrifice instead to Zeus the Deliverer, and carried the lion to Mycenae." Apollodorus tells us further, that the famous club was cut in these very woods.

Pindar¹ speaks of " deep-soiled Nemea;" but the character of the country to-day is indeed changed, and the " deep soil " has been washed away by the storms of the ages. There is scarcely a human habitation to be seen. Here and there a patch of green offers scanty pasture to a herd of goats. It is a lonely land, not however without a certain harsh beauty, and the wild flowers and the laughing river whose course we follow lend cheerfulness to the scene. The Nemean Games took place at a spot some twelve miles to the westward of our road, but we had not time to turn aside for a visit to the remains of the ancient temple, stadium and theatre.

From Nemea the road descended and of a sudden a glorious prospect unfolded itself. Far across the plain of " thirsty Argos," sparkled the Gulf of Nauplia. On the right we could see the snowy tops of the Laconian Mountains, and on the left the Argolid peaks, their foot hills running out in a peninsula whereon we could just discern the fortified promontory which was Nauplia. The white houses of Argos were visible opposite Nauplia, in the south western corner of the plain. Near at hand upon our left two mountains formed a sharp angle in which rose the citadel of Mycenae.

“Mycenae rich in gold . . . in the inner heart of horse-nurturing Argos,” Homer calls it; and a visit to the national museum at Athens, where its treasures are preserved, convinces the traveller that the epithet is well deserved. We were in the land of the awful tragedies of the house of Pelops. Argos and Mycenae and Tiryns have become so blended in the stories told by the great poets, that it is not easy to assign each legend to its proper scene.

We climbed the long hill leading from the plain to the gate of the ancient city, and paused for a while to visit the wonderful “Bee Hive tomb” called the “Treasury of Atreus.” The slope contains many such tombs, but this is far the finest. Yet we are not to believe that the royal family had their burial here, but rather that they may probably have been tenants of the graves assigned them by Schliemann in the acropolis itself.

Over the gate of the citadel which we approached after a turn in the road are the great lions. They stand in heraldic fashion on either side of a column in relief half facing the spectator. The heads have disappeared, but the splendid animals guard the citadel gate in lordly fashion still. We passed under the gigantic lintel, and found ourselves at the entrance of the strange enclosure where the unhappy royal family obtained rest at last.

We climbed some ancient steps and tried to decipher the puzzle of the palace ruins. These shattered walls have witnessed terrible scenes. We recalled the horrid banquet of the children of Thyestes, the unholy revels of the queen while her lord was far away in Troy, and she, after weary waiting and long angry grief for her sacrificed Iphigenia, had consoled herself in the unhallowed love of Aegisthus, her husband's deadliest foe. The women's apartments too reminded us of the sad neglected life of the princess Electra, after she had sent her little brother to be brought up far away from the dangers at home. In front of the palace we seemed to listen to the eager discussions of the elders of the town as they passed from mouth to mouth the news, which the torch from Ida had conveyed, that Troy had fallen. And we could hear their words of grief not unmingled with mutterings of resentment.

Chorus: " For ¹ those who departed
From the Grecian land together Grief in the heart enduring
In the home of each is seen.
Ay! There be many things that touch the heart!

" For those whom one sent forth
He well remembereth —
No living men but urns and ashes
To the home of each return —

“ Ares, Gold-Broker of men’s bodies,
Scale-Holder in the conflict of the spear,
Sendeth from Ilium to loved ones
Fire-blackened dust and grievous —
For bitter weeping.
Packing the vessels close with dust
Instead of living men.

“ And thus they mourn: —
Praising one hero, how in battle skilled;
A second fallen glorious in fight,
All for another’s wife.

“ And silently they mutter other things,
And grief, with ill-will mingled, Stealthily creepeth in their hearts against The champion Atridae.

“ But ah, those others yonder lie
In all their loveliness beneath the walls,
In tombs on Ilian soil.
The foeman’s earth hath covered them.”

We picture to ourselves the triumphant return of the king, and the proud crimson spread for him to tread as he alights from his chariot.

Clytemnestra:¹ “ But now, beloved life, I pray descend

From this thy car, Oh King, nor set thy foot,
Sacker of Ilium, on the common earth.
Slaves! Wherefore loiter, unto whom to strew
The path with tapestries hath been ordained?
Straightway a road of purple be prepared
That Justice lead him to unhoped-for home."

Agamemnon: "Nay, do not pamper me in woman's wise,
Nor, like barbarian, prone obeisance gape,
Nor spread with garments envy-breeding way.
For gods alone such worship be reserved!
But for a mortal on embroidered gauds
To tread, to me is no wise free from fear.
As man I bid ye greet me, not as God.
Apart from footmats and from needlework
My fame proclaimeth me. A righteous mind
Is Heaven's best gift; and him alone deem blest,
His days who endeth in prosperity.
If thus I ever fare, no dread is mine."

Clytemnestra: "Nay, say not thus, opposing will of mine."

Agamemnon: "Know, this opinion I will ne'er unsay."

Clytemnestra: "'Twas fear that made thee vow thou thus wouldst do."

Agamemnon: "Yea, if a vow with knowledge e'er was made."

Clytemnestra: " And how had Priam done if victor he? "

Agamemnon: " Indeed on broidered garments he had trod! "

Clytemnestra: " Then fear not blame from any human tongue."

Agamemnon: " Well, if thou'lt have it so, let someone loose

With haste my sandals, servants of my feet,
And as I tread these ocean-crimsoned dyes,
May eye of Envy strike not from afar.
For I am loath with garment-spoiling feet,
This wealth of silver-purchased web to waste.

But since thou hast prevailed on me to hear, Treading on purple I approach these halls."

We seem to hear the shrieks of the shrinking Cassandra, who lifts her eyes and sees the horrid vision of the murdered infants.

Cassandra:¹ " Apollo, Apollo, God of Ways, Destroyer!

Ah whither hast thou led me, to what halls?

Hated of Heaven indeed, conscious of many a crime,
Domestic murder and the deadly noose.
Shambles of human blood, sprinkled upon the ground."

Chorus: " Keen-scented doth the stranger seem, like hound

She tracketh blood of those she too shall find."

Cassandra: " Alas! Alas!

Yonder my witnesses, thence my conviction drawn!
Yon infants, wailing loud their massacre;
Wailing the roasted flesh by their own sire devour'd! "

Chorus: " In truth thy fame prophetic we had heard,

But at this hour we seek no prophets here."

Cassandra: " Alas! ah me! what can be planning now?
What this fresh deed of woe?

A mighty crime is plotting in these halls,
Unbearable to friends, incurable,
And help is far away."

Chorus: " Of these thy warnings, I am all unskilled
But those I knew. The town doth speak of them."

Cassandra: " Ah! wretched woman, wilt thou do this deed?

The husband of thy bed
Washed in the bath —
How shall I speak the end?

With speed this deed shall be; and after hand
The hand outstretcheth."

Chorus: " I understand not; after riddles now
I am bewildered by thy warnings dark."

Cassandra: " Woe! Woe! Alas! Alas! What is yon sight I see?

Surely some net of Hell!

Ah! but the snare is She, wife of his wedded couch, Sharing the guilt of his death. — Now let the Fury band

Shriek o'er the hated race for a victim by stoning slain! "

Chorus: " What Fury this thou biddest o'er this house

To raise the shout? Thy words no joy portend.

But to my heart hath fled

The blood-drop, crocus-dyed,

Blood, that in death distilled its course doth end

With the rays of sinking life."

Cassandra: " Woe! Woe! Behold! Behold!

Keep from the cow the bull!

Lo, in a robe she hath caught

And with black horn smiteth him,

Yea, and he falleth down

In the bath with water filled.

I tell thee the vessel's tale, the vessel of treason and death."

Chorus: " Of oracles I boast not to be skilled

But to some horror I must liken this —

Ah! but from Oracles

Tidings of good to men,

When they are sent? For lo,
Only through woes these arts,
Uttered with many words, god-spoken terror bring.” Cassandra: “ Woe’s me! Ill fated lot of me, the wretched!

Of my own doom thou speakest further now —
Ah! whither hast thou led me, the unhappy?
For naught but that I die with him. How else? ” Chorus: “ Thou art some frenzied one, possessed of Heaven,

And of thyself thou singest
A strain that is no strain,
As the brown-bright nightingale,
Insatiate of lament,
In her heart unhappy ever,
Her Itys, Itys, wailing —
Her life so rich in sorrow.”

Cassandra: “ Alas! Alas! — Fate of the clear-voiced nightingale!

For lo, to her the gods
A winged form have given,
And life of sweetness, free from true lamenting;
But ah! for me awaiteth Cleaving with sword two-edged.”

Chorus: “ Whence these vain heaven sent pangs Upon thee hastening?
And with cry ill omened,
Thou fashionest a note of fear,
Mingled with shrill-pitched strains.

Whence hast thou learned these limits of the path
Of heavenly speech ill-uttered? "

Cassandra: " Woe for the bridal, the bridal
Of Paris, the bale of dear ones.
Alas Scamander's stream ancestral!
There was I nurtured, luckless one,
Beside thy banks.
But now beside Cocytus
And shores of Acheron,
I soon methinks shall utter prophecy."

Chorus: " What is this word thou speakest all too plain?

Even a child might understand.
And 'neath my heart a bleeding bite hath smitten,

As thou bemoanest plaintively
Thy grievous destiny —
Marvels for me to hear! "

Cassandra: " Woe for the sorrows, the sorrows
Of my city all undone!

Ah, sacrifices offered by my sire
To save our walls, and slaughterings of sheep!

But remedy they brought not
But that my country fall as e'en she fell.

But I with frenzied heart will soon
Fling me upon the ground! "

Chorus: " Consistent with thy former words
These thou hast uttered now.

And some ill-willing demon from above

Heavily falling on thee, causeth thee
To sing these lamentable death-fraught strains.

But for the end I am perplexed."

Cassandra: " The word no longer then shall from a veil

Peep forth, in fashion of a bride new wed,
But blowing clear against the rising sun
Shall come, and like a billow it shall dash Against his beams, far greater than the woes
It told before. No more in riddles now!
And bear me witness, as I run along Scenting the track of ill wrought long ago.
For never shall the troop desert these halls,
Of horrors, chanting harmony unblest;
And having drunken, and become more bold,
Of human blood, within the house shall bide
The band of Furies, home-bred, unexpelled. —
And, seated in the house, shall hymn their strain
Of primal horror, and in turn they loathe
The brother's couch defiled and him who sinned. —
Hath my shaft missed? Or hath the archer sped?
Or am I prophet false and beggar vain?
Bear witness swearing, by no mere report
I know the ancient horrors of the house.

Cassandra: " Woe! Woe! Alas! the horrors!
Once more the labour of true prophecy
Stingeth with dread disturbing prelude-chant.
Behold yon infants seated in the halls

Like in their shapes to forms beheld in dreams!
Those children, as it were by dear ones slain,
Their hands with kindred food of their own flesh
Filled, and the entrails — burden pitiful! —
Which their own sire did taste — behold them there!
Vengeance for this I say one plotteth now,
Cowardly lion, dallying in the couch,
Home keeping — woe is me, — against my lord
Returning, mine, for yoke of slave I bear.
The lord of ships, the conqueror of Troy
Naught knoweth what the tongue of the foul dog
Speaking in flattering words, with joyous mien,
Like lurking hell, shall cause in dark event.
Such is her daring. Of the man the woman
Is slayer foul — then calling her what name
Of hateful beast, might I attain the mark?
Some basilisk or Scylla, 'mid the rocks
Lurking, destruction to the seafarer?
Hell's raging mother, breathing truceless curse
Upon the house? And how she raised the cry
Of joy, — audacious — as at turn of fight!
Feigning delight her lord was safe returned.
These things I care not if thou dost believe.
The future cometh. Soon lamenting thou Too true a prophet shalt pronounce me then.”
Chorus: “Thyestes' feast of flesh of children slain
I recognize with horror, and I fear Things heard in truth nor by similitude.
But for the rest I wander from the track.”

Cassandra: " King Agamemnon murdered thou shalt see! "

Chorus: " Unhappy woman! Hush ill-omened tongue! "

Cassandra: " No Healing-god presideth o'er this word."

Chorus: " If ill befall — but may it ne'er betide! "

Cassandra: " Thou prayest. They the deed of death prepare."

Chorus: " What man committeth such a deed of woe? "

Cassandra: " Surely my imprecations thou hast missed."

Chorus: " The doer's scheme I fail to comprehend."

Cassandra: " Yet I too well have learned the Hellene tongue."

Chorus: " Yea, and the Pythian oracles obscure."

Cassandra: " Alas the fire! It cometh on again!

Apollo, King Lycaean, woe is me!

Yonder two footed lioness, with wolf

Paired, in the absence of the lion kingly,

Will slay me wretched one, and as a drug

Mingling, she boasted in the cup of wrath

To fling for me the quittance, while the sword

She sharpeneth for her husband, paying thus

Murder for me whom he hath carried off.

Why then these trappings keep of mockery

Staff and prophetic garlands on my neck?

You first, ere my own death, I will destroy.

Go to perdition flung — I follow soon.
Enrich some other Fury in my place.
Behold Apollo stripping me himself
Of robe prophetic, looking on in scorn
On me in these adornments greatly mocked,
By friends, by foes, too plainly without cause.

Yet not dishonoured of the gods I die.
Another champion of my cause shall come,
By mother's death a father to avenge —
Though now a wandering exile from this land,
Stranger afar, he cometh, for his friends
To place the cap-stone on these deeds of woe.
For mighty is the oath the gods have sworn,
His murdered father's fall shall bring him home.
Why then do I make piteous lament
When once I have beheld my Ilium Faring as she hath fared — and those who took Requited thus by judgment of the gods?
I go to meet my fate, will dare to die.
But yonder gates of Hades I address,
And pray I may receive a fatal blow,
That free from struggle, life-blood ebbing fast,
In death at last I close mine eyes to rest."
Chorus: " Woman of many sorrows, wise in much,
Long hast thou stretched the tale, but if in truth
Thy doom thou knowest, why like god-spiced ox
Dost thou so bravely to the altar tread? "

Cassandra: "Escape, oh strangers, can no longer be."

Chorus: "Yet is the last in time the gainer held."

Cassandra: "My day is come. I little gain by flight."

Chorus: "Know thou art brave and of enduring soul."

Cassandra: "The happy never hear such words of praise."

Chorus: "Yet to die nobly is esteemed a boon."

Cassandra: "Alas my father and thy noble race!"

Chorus: "Nay what is this? What dread doth turn thee back?"

Cassandra: "Woe! Woe!"

Chorus: "Why criest thus? Some hateful phantasy?"

Cassandra: "Blood-dripping massacre these halls breathe forth."

Chorus: "Nay, of domestic sacrifice it smelleth."

Cassandra: "Behold a vapour, like as from the tomb."

Chorus: "No Syrian decking of the house thou namest."

Cassandra: "I go, and in the halls will shriek my doom

And Agamemnon's — Now enough of life!

Alas! oh strangers!

Not idly as a bird doth dread the bush,

I shrink — Bear witness after I am gone,

When woman shall for me a woman fall,
And man, in recompense for man ill-wed.
I claim this boon as one about to die."

Chorus: " Unhappy one, I pity this thy doom."

Cassandra: " One word I fain would add, not mine own dirge;

But this last ray of sunlight I invoke,
That my avengers in full measure pay
Requital on my slaughterers abhorred,
For murdered slave — an easy victory!
Ah mortal fortunes! If they happy be,
Like to a shadow they! But be they ill,
A wetted sponge doth blot the picture out.
And these I pity far more than the rest."

Here is the chamber where the fatal bath was prepared; there the palace doorway where the exultant queen boasted of her victory and showed her murdered lord to the angry people.

Clytemnestra: " I¹ stand where I did strike —
The deed is done.

And so I wrought, this will I not deny.
That neither could he flee nor fend his doom.
A net with outlet none, as 'twere for fish,
I cast about him, fatal wealth of robe,
And struck him twice — and straightway with two groans

His limbs relaxed, and prostrate as he lay,
To fill the tale of blows, I struck a third,
To Saviour Zeus below a votive boon.
Falling, he panted thus his life away,
And, gasping forth sharp jet of blood, he cast
On me a torrent dark of sanguine dew.
And I rejoiced no less than planted field
At earing-time, in wealth from heaven poured — Thus matters stand, Oh Argive deputies.
Ye may rejoice or not, but I exult.
And if 'twere seemly on a corpse to pour Libation, I had more than justly poured —
Such bowl of cursings in this house this man Filled, and himself on his return hath drunk.”

Clytemnestra: “ . . . At ¹ my hand he fell,
I too will bury him;
But not with lamentations from the halls attending.
Iphigenia his daughter, as is meet,
With welcome shall her father greet,
By the swift stream descending
To world of woe;
And round him in embrace
Her arms shall throw.”

Chorus: “ Lo, chiding new for chiding in rebuttal:
But hard the cause to judicate.

Spoiled is the spoiler, and the slayer payeth.
Abideth fixed, while Zeus is on his throne,

Here too is the spot where in after time her own son Orestes plunged his sword into the breast she held toward him in despairing supplication.

Clytemnestra: “ Ah ¹ me! Thy riddle I too well can read.

I fall by treason, as in truth I slew.
Let some one quickly bring a murderous ax!
I'll know if victor or if vanquished I.
For to this pitch of evil I am come.”

Orestes: “ Thee, thee, I seek. Thy partner hath enough.”

Clytemnestra: “ Alas! Aegisthus dearest, art thou dead? ”

Orestes: “ Thou lov'st the fellow? Therefore in one tomb

Thou'lt lie, and never him in death forsake.”

Clytemnestra: “ Hold! child of mine, and reverence
this breast,

At which thou hast, in infant slumber, oft Sucked with thy gums the milk that nourished
thee.”

Orestes: “ Oh Pylades! Dare I my mother slay? ”

Pylades: “ Where else the Oracles of Loxias

Uttered at Pytho? And the pledges sure?
Hold all men hostile rather than the gods."

Orestes: " I judge thee victor, and thy counsel best.
Follow, I'd slay thee close to yonder wretch.
In life thou deem'dst him dearer than my sire —
Now sleep beside him dead, since thou dost love
This fellow, and dost hate whom thou shouldst love."

Clytemnestra: " I nursed thee, and with thee would pass mine age."

Orestes: " My father's murderess! Thou to dwell with me? "

Clytemnestra: " 'Twas fate, my son, that shared the guilt of this."

Orestes: " Thy death as well 'tis fate hath brought to pass."

Clytemnestra: " Dost thou not dread a mother's curse, my child? "

Orestes: " Nay, for my mother cast me off to griefs."

Clytemnestra: " Nay, not cast off; to friendly home it was."

Orestes: " Of free born father, I was doubly sold."

Clytemnestra: " Where then the price which I received for thee? "

Orestes: " I blush to speak thy shame thus openly."

Clytemnestra: " Nay, of thy father's guilty deeds speak too! "

Orestes: " Safe in the house, chide not the toiler thou."

Clytemnestra: "'Tis hard for wife when severed from her spouse."

Orestes: "The toil of spouse doth feed the wife at home."

Clytemnestra: "So thou, my child, wilt slay thy mother then?"

Orestes: "'Tis thou thyself, not I, thyself wilt slay."

Clytemnestra: "Look well! Beware a mother's angry hounds!"

Orestes: "How, if remiss, my father's can I
'scape?"

Clytemnestra: "I, living, to a tomb¹ bewail in vain."

Orestes: "Yea, for my father's death hath sent this doom."

Clytemnestra: "Ah me! This serpent I have borne and nursed!"

Orestes: "True prophet was thy terror from the dream

Thou slewest whom thou should'st not! Bear thy fate!"

From these doors a mother's furies pursued the matricide, until in holy Athens they were appeased at last, and the curse of Tantalus was lifted from the fifth generation. Indeed the sins of the fathers have been visited on their children. For so it is

CHAPTER VIII

THE ARGOLID AND NAUPLIA

OUR imagination was sated with horrors, and it was a relief to descend to the bright plain, and follow the course of the Inachus beside which Io used to play, till it sweeps past Argos to the sea.

*Io:*¹ " For nightly visions ever visiting My maiden chamber, wooed me with soft words:
' Oh damsel greatly blest, why thus so long Unmated, while 'tis given thee to gain
Bridal most high? For Zeus, with shaft of love
For thee inflamed, would fain thy favours win.
But thou, oh child, spurn not the couch of Zeus;
But hie thee forth to Lerna's deep-soiled mead,
To pastures of thy father's flocks and herds.
That so the eye of Zeus be soothed from longing.
By dreams like these, each night was I beset,
Unhappy maid, until I dared at last Confess the night-seen visions to my sire."

Time compelled us to leave the temple of Hera unvisited. It lies at some distance to the eastward of our road, and has in recent years been the scene of successful excavations made by American archæologists. The Heraeum was one of the oldest sanctuaries of Greece. A scarab of Thothmes III has been found among its ruins, and the temple registers furnished a system of dating older than the reckoning by Olympiads. Here the Greeks acknowledged Agamemnon as commander in chief of the expedition to Troy, and the great Goddess never failed in loyal zeal for the success of the Grecian arms.

The most interesting story connected with the Heraeum is the one told by Herodotus.

When Solon was at the court of the Lydian king, Croesus, the king, after showing him his possessions, asked him who was the happiest man whom he had ever seen. When Solon replied that it was Tellos the Athenian, who had died for his country, the disappointed king “asked¹ him further who was the second happiest whom he had seen, next after Tellos — expecting of course that he himself was surely to win second honours. Solon however answered ‘Cleobis and Biton,’ for these, being of Argive stock, possessed sufficient means of subsistence, and in addition to this, enjoyed strength of body, such as I shall relate. Both alike had been prize-winners in the games, and the following story is told of them: When the Argives were celebrating a festival of Hera, it became quite necessary that their mother¹ be conveyed to the temple on a wagon. Now their oxen had not returned from the fields in season. The youths, therefore, constrained by the shortness of the time, put on the yoke and drew the wagon themselves, while their mother rode thereon. And after they had drawn her forty-five stades,² they reached the temple. Now when they had done this, and had been seen by the assembly of worshippers, a most glorious ending of life came upon them; and the god showed thereby that it was a better thing for a man to die than to live. For the Argive men thronged about them, congratulating the young men for their strength; while the Argive women congratulated the mother who had been blest with such sons. And the mother, overjoyed at the deed and the praise of it, stood facing the image of the goddess, and prayed that the goddess would grant to Cleobis and Biton, her sons, who had so greatly honoured her, that boon which is most blessed for a man to obtain. And after this prayer, when they had feasted and made merry, the young men slept in the temple, and waked not again, but met with this end of life."

² From the city of Argos.

“ Not ¹ false this tale, but eminent for truth —
The holy piety of Cydippe’s sons:
For sweet and joyful was the mark attained —
Death in life’s Springtime — by the hero pair.
Since for their mother’s love they took on them
The heavy burden of a task renowned.
Hail ’mid the dead, famed for your piety!
Through ages be this glory yours alone.”

The Heraeum was the scene of the well known tale of the philosopher Pythagoras and the shield of Euphorbus. Menelaus, after his return from Troy, dedicated in this temple the captured shield of Euphorbus, whom he had killed. In later years, Pythagoras entered the temple and selected this shield at once from the many votive shields hung on the walls. It proved to have the name of Euphorbus upon it. Now Pythagoras in teaching the doctrine of metempsychosis had always claimed to be a reincarnation of Euphorbus, and he announced that he had established the claim by his success in picking out the right shield.

Argos is familiar to us from childhood as the birth-place of Perseus. Hawthorne tells the story in his delightful Tanglewood Tales. The king Acrisius placed his daughter Danaë and her little son in a chest, and committed them to the waves of the

Nauplian Gulf. The beautiful poem of Simonides was in our mind:

“ When ¹ in the richly inlaid chest she lay Tossed by the blowing wind and sea upheaved,
Then on her wetted cheeks pale terror stole;
And round her Perseus her protecting arm
She cast and spake: ‘ Ah child, what sorrow I Must bear for thee, whilst thou the flower of sleep
Dost cull, and in thy calm oblivion still,
In joyless bronze-clamped chest thou liest nestling,
Wrapped in a rayless night and darksome gloom.
The deep brine sweeping o’er thy tender locks,
The passing wave, thou heedest not, nor voice
Of winds, but, in thy crimson blanket wrapped,
Thou still dost press thy face against my face.
But if the fear to thee were fear indeed,
Thou to my words wouldst lend thy tiny ear.
But nay, I bid thee still sleep on, my child,
And sleep the sea, and sleep our cruel woe!
And oh, from thee may some blest change appear,
Oh Father Zeus! — And if apart from right,
Or overbold my prayer, oh pardon me.”

A short fragment from the lost Acrisius of Sophocles gives us a glimpse of the proud princess when her fault has become known to her cruel father:

“ Brief ¹ speech beseemeth those whose thoughts are pure,
In answer to a parent; more than all
When one is of the Argive stock, a maid, Whose ornament is silence and few words.”

Another fragment from a lost drama — the Danaë of Euripides — depicts the intense maternal affection of the heroine:

“ My ² women, dear is light of yonder sun,
And fair to see the windless ocean flood,
The vernal bloom of Earth, the wealth of streams —
Of many blessings I might sing the praise.
But naught so bright nor goodly to behold
Exists as when to childless ones, whose hearts
Are gnawed by longing, is vouchsafed at last
To see the light of infants in their homes.”

There was little to detain us in Argos except the fine ancient theatre, and we took our way through the streets of the typical modern Greek town, and hurried on to Tiryns.³ Archæologists consider this the best spot in Greece for studying the arrangements of a fortified palace of Homeric times. The famous galleries served in the War of Independence to give shelter to fugitives from the Turkish soldiery. Their exact purpose in ancient times is a matter of controversy to the learned. The guide of to-day tells the traveller that they are a favourite haunt for sheep and goats, and that it is by the innocent agency of these, that the grim gallery walls have been worn to a mirror-like smoothness. The cruel Eurystheus was king of Tiryns in days of old, and it was at his bidding and the divine behest of Hera that Heracles was compelled to go up and down Greece performing his twelve labours, and freeing the land from the monsters that were its plague. The slaying of the Lernaean Hydra is held by those who rationalize the myth to contain a tale of the draining of the marsh of Lerna which had rendered the town of Argos unhealthy.

³ The ancient city fortified, we are told, by Perseus and the Lycian Cyclopes.

At nightfall we reached Nauplia — Napoli di Romania, as it was often called in the early part of the nineteenth century. Certainly the Bay of Nauplia is in the opinion of many more beautiful than the great Bay of Naples itself. Many traces of Frankish and Venetian occupation remain in gates and fortifications, and even in a few palaces with coats of arms emblazoned on the walls.

The town was named for Nauplios, son of Poseidon, famous for the vengeance he took on the Greek fleet as it approached the Euboean Promontory on the return from Troy. The story is contained in Scholia on the Dramatists and in fragments of lost plays. Palamedes and Oeax were sons of Nauplios. The former was a clever inventor. To him were ascribed, among other inventions, the games of draughts and dice, the building of the first lighthouses, and the art of writing on tablets. Once, when during the siege of Troy the Greeks were disheartened by a famine and by the discomforts of their endless task, Palamedes cheered them by the introduction of his new games. At the beginning of the war, it was his cleverness that detected the feigned madness of Odysseus, and forced that wily hero to a reluctant participation in the expedition. For this Odysseus cherished deep resentment, and in conjunction with the Atridae, who were jealous of the popularity of Palamedes, he contrived by a trick to make it appear that their enemy was in traitorous correspondence with King Priam. Palamedes was stoned to death, and his brother wrote the tale on wooden tablets which he committed to the sea in hopes that some might float home to Nauplia and inform King Nauplios of the murder of his son. The plan was successful, and Nauplios set a deceitful beacon on a dangerous cape of Euboea, which lured many of the returning Greeks to death by shipwreck.

“ Oblivion’s ¹ cure I only did provide

Inventing, so mankind might letters know.
Thus, though far absent over ocean's tract
A man might learn the fortunes of his home.
And, at a death, to children might be told
In writing plain, the measure of their wealth.
And that which might to evil strife have led,
The tablet judgeth and forbiddeth lies."

In another fragment the Chorus reproaches Odysseus and the Greeks:

" Ye ¹ have slain, ye have slain
The all-wise one, ye Danai!
The Muses' nightingale,
Who ne'er caused grief to any."

The fortified height above Nauplia retains the name of Palamidi to this day. The town has played an important part in the military history of Greece in post-classic times. Its capture from the Turks in 1822 gave great encouragement to the revolutionists, and it became for a time the capital of the newly liberated nation when the war was over. Here the first President, Capodistrias, was assassinated, and it was at Nauplia that King Otho first made his entry into his dominions.

CHAPTER IX

DELPHI

“ WHEN the lightning flashed through Harma,”¹ the mission to Delphi was wont to proceed thither by the Sacred Way, passing through Eleusis and the defiles of Cithaeron; then across Boeotia and through the winding passes of Parnassus. The road was built by Theseus to conduct Apollo on his triumphal journey from Athens, whither he had come from his birthplace in Delos.

The traveller to-day, however, usually goes to the port of Itea by steamer from Piraeus through the new canal, or else by rail to Corinth and thence across the Gulf by one of the very irregular steamers. The journey by sea from Piraeus is the most comfortable, and it is interesting too. We skirted closely the outer coast of Salamis, and sailed through the calm Saronic as it narrowed towards the Isthmus, and after passing through the canal we issued forth into the Corinthian Gulf for a sail of three or four hours on one of the most beautiful stretches of water in the world. We passed the rock of Hera Acraia, the "Gibraltar of the Corinthian Gulf." Like its namesake, it resembles a crouching lion with head erect and mighty paws extending seaward. This is the spot where Medea buried her children, carrying them from Corinth in her winged chariot.¹ Her parting words to them when she has resolved upon their death are among the most heart-breaking to be found in the "most pathetic" of poets.

*Medea:*² " Oh children, children, ye a city have
And home, wherein, forsaking wretched me,
Ye aye shall dwell, bereft of mothers' love:
While I to other lands an exile go
Ere any joy I win of you, and see
Your happiness, ere wife and nuptial couch
I deck, and hold aloft the marriage torch.
Ah me, unhappy for my daring deed!
In vain, then, children, did I nurture you,
In vain I laboured, and was worn with toil,
In vain I bore the grievous travail-pangs.
Unhappy! Many hopes I had in you,
That some day surely ye would tend mine age,

² Eurip.: Medea, 1022 ff.

And with your hands my body deck in death,
Of mortals envied. But the sweet hope now
Is perished. For henceforth bereft of you,
A mournful life and grievous I must pass.
And ye no more with loving eyes shall look Upon your mother in your altered life.
Woe, woe, why gaze ye at me, children mine?
Why laugh unto me this last laugh of all?
Ah me, what can I do? My heart is faint,
Oh women, at the bright face of my babes.
I cannot do it, farewell former plans!
I take my children with me from the land.

Yet how is it with me? Shall I endure
To be a jest of unrequited foes?
This must be dared. But ah, unhappy me,
That I should have let fall such weakling words!
Go, children, to the house. Let him who hath
No part in this my service, look to it!
I will not spoil the deed of my right hand.

But lo, I needs must tread a woful road,
And these must send on one more woful still.
My boys I'd fain address, give, children mine,
Give to your mother your right hand to kiss.
Oh, dearest hand and dearest face to me!
My children's form and noble countenance!
Blessed be ye — but yonder — for your sire

Hath robbed you of your sojourn here. Oh sweet Embrace, soft skin, and dearest breath of babes!
Away! Away! no longer can I bear
To look upon you, conquered by my woe."

Beyond the promontory the Gulf widens, and as we passed out the clouds began to gather over the white tops of the distant mountains of Arcadia and soon shut out the Peloponnesian shore. Once for a moment the clouds suddenly parted, and framed a picture of solemn splendour. Behind the dark masses of the nearer mountains, the snowy top of Cyllene was flooded with golden sunlight. The diamond-shaped rent in the clouds was as it were fringed with an edging of silver fur. In another moment all was dark again, and a torrent of rain succeeded, shutting out the view entirely, and continuing till we landed at the little port of Itea — the ancient Cirrha — where we passed the night.

When morning came the storm was over and we enjoyed the sunlit view from the balcony of the inn until the mules were saddled and our procession ready to start.

At first our course lay through the great olive groves of the famous Crissaeian Plain. This sacred land played a fatal part in Grecian history. The inhabitants of Crisa had been wont to plunder pilgrims on their way to visit the shrine of Delphi, until — at the instigation of the Pythia — Solon and the Athenians, in alliance with Clisthenes of Sicyon, destroyed the guilty town in 591 B. C. and dedicated the Plain as the inviolable possession of the god. In honour of this event the famous Pythian Games were founded. In late times, however, the inhabitants of Amphissa cast covetous eyes upon the fair fields which spread themselves below their mountain fastness, and dared to seize and cultivate the holy soil. To punish them for this outrage, the Amphictyonic Council, the national guardians of the rights of Delphi, declared a Sacred War. Then it was that Philip of Macedon knew that his time had come. His intervention in the Sacred War was the beginning of the end, and only a year later the independence of Greece perished on the fatal field of Chaeronea.

Our road through the olives led us to the foot of Parnassus. Northwestward climbed the road to Amphissa. We left this on our left and after an hour reached the flourishing town of Cryso, which preserves in its name the memory of the town destroyed twenty-five centuries ago. Below us on our right the Pleistos emerged from the gorge which narrows fast. An hour more and we dismounted at Kastri, the new village to which the inhabitants whose houses were destroyed by the excavations were removed.

From the balcony of our little lodging, a marvellous prospect was unfolded. Far below us stretching towards the sea was the Sacred Plain dark with its olives. To our right were the lower spurs of Kiona, whose summit overtops Parnassus itself. To the left, the solemn gorge of the Pleistos, and in the cliff which forms its southern wall we could see the dark opening of the cave of Lamia, the horrid goblin whose name was used to terrify rebellious children into submission.

Before visiting the excavations, we walked along the road past them, that first we might purify ourselves in the waters of the Castalian spring which flows forth from the angle of the Phaedriades. These are two cliffs which form natural walls to north-east and southeast of the holy precinct. From one of these, Hyampeia, good old Aesop was hurled to his death. He was accused by his enemies of having robbed the shrine. They had concealed in his baggage some of the sacred vessels, and in spite of his protestations and the warnings he uttered in his quaint form of fables, he was dragged to the edge of the cliff and hurled over. But the gods made his innocence manifest, and his death was avenged by a destructive earthquake which soon after visited the spot.

The spring of Castalia has been famed in song and story above all other fountains. He who drinks of its waters is blessed with the gift of poetry for ever. Here those who would visit the shrine must first pause for purification:

“ Pure ¹ to the temple approach of the undefiled deity, stranger,
Pure in thy soul, and bathe in the sacred stream of the nymphs.
Since for the good sufficeth the smallest drop — but the wicked
Even the Ocean vast never could cleanse with his streams.”

The band of maidens sent from Tyre to serve in the temple thus greet the holy scene:

“ Leaving ² the swell of the Tyrian Sea,
Lo I am come for Loxias,
Far from the Isle Phoenician,
Slave to the halls of Phoebus,
Where, 'neath the snow-swept mountain ridge
Of Parnassus, his seat was chosen.

Still it awaiteth me to lave
In Castalia's flowing waters
My hair, the pride of my maidenhood,
In service divine of Phoebus.
Hail, thou Rock that dost light the gleam
O'er the twin peaked Bacchic mountains.
Hail, Vine that distillest the daily wine,
Forth putting thy fruitful cluster.

² Eur.: Phoen., 202 ff.

Hail, holy cave of the dragon, hail,
Ye hill-top watch-towers of the gods,
And sacred snow-smitten mountain, hail!
Ah! would I in praise of the deathless One Might weave the dance on fearless feet
By the mid-earth Hollow of Phoebus! ”

We rested beneath the ancient plane tree, planted they say by Agamemnon; and refreshed and purified we approached the shrine. On either hand are the ruins of the votive offerings — too often, alas! commemorating fratricidal victories — and of the treasures which offered such rich loot for Nero and other plunderers, in spite of whom the site could still offer thousands of statues as late as the time of Pausanias. The Athenian treasure-house is being rebuilt of its original materials, which were lying almost intact. Its decorations have been taken to the museum, and their place supplied by admirable reproductions. Upon the walls are hymns to Apollo with musical notation — a rare archæological prize — and an inscription in situ speaks of the battle of Marathon, in honour of which the treasury was built.

We passed the rough rock from which, in earliest days of all, the Sibyl Herophile uttered prophecy, foretelling among other things the fatal story of Helen. We paused for a moment in the Athenian Stoa and then continued our gradual ascent. As the Sacred Way turned to the northward round the end of the great temple, we saw before us the pedestal of one of the most interesting monuments in the world. Upon this pedestal stood the great tripod offered by redeemed Greece from the spoils of Plataea. The central support was of brazen serpents intertwined. On it were inscribed the names of the States that took part in this culminating victory of the Persian War, and many of these names may still be read upon the portion preserved at Constantinople, whither it was carried by Constantine to adorn the Hippodrome of his new capital. It is related that Mohammed II, who wrested Constantinople from the Christians in 1453 A. D., smote one of the brazen serpent heads with his sword, declaring that the conqueror of Europe thus avenged the ancient defeat of Asia.

But we were at last come to Earth's very centre, the Pythian shrine itself. We stood where young Ion stood, in the portal which he used to sweep each morning at sunrise with such devotion.

“ Lo,¹ yonder gleameth the four-horsed car
And Helios now sheddeth day o'er the land.
The stars are fleeing before his blaze
 To the holy night.
And the peaks untrod of Parnassus Mount
With dawn illumined, receive for men
 The chariot wheel diurnal.

“ Dry incense smoke to the lofty roof
Of Phoebus flieth.
On the tripod divine her seat doth take
The Delphian, singing to Greeks the strains Whatever Apollo may utter.

“ But oh ye Delphian ministers
Of Phoebus, hie to the silver whirls
Of Castalia, where with unsullied dew
Having washed you clean, the temple approach.
And guard ye well from ill-speaking the lips,
And words of blest import, to those who fain
Would the shrine consult,
From your own lips see that ye utter.

“ While I, at my task which from Childhood's hour
I ever ply, with the laurel boughs
And holy wreaths, the gate of the God
Will adorn, and sprinkle the floor bedewed
With moistened drops. And the flocks of birds
Who the shrines defile
Of the images holy, with bow of mine
I will put to flight — For, sprung from none
From father nor mother, my nursling home
The Temple of Phoebus I cherish.

“ Oh minister fresh blooming, hail
My broom of laurel fair,
Who Phoebus' altar in his fane
Hast ever in thy care!

“ In gardens never dying, whence
The streams of holy dew
Their ever-flowing springs send forth,
Thy sacred myrtle grew.

“ With thee I sweep the floor divine
Throughout the livelong day,
With swift wing of the rising sun,
My service glad I pay.

“ Oh Paeon, oh Paeon!
Blessed, oh, blessed
Be thou, Latona's son!

“ Fair is the task I ply
Oh Phoebus, at thy shrine,
Thy seat prophetic honouring,
Glorious the task for aye.

“ To gods who live for ever
My hand in thrall is held,
And in glad labour thus to toil
I can grow weary never.

“ Phoebus my sire divine!
For him who nurtured me I praise
To him is due a father's name
The Phoebus of this shrine.

“ Oh Paeon, oh Paean!
Blessed, oh, blessed
Be thou, Latona's son! ”

Of Apollo's lordly temple all is in ruins except the pavement, and we search in vain for the relics of its past glories. Gone is the great entrance porch over which were inscribed in golden letters the sayings of the Seven Sages. “ Know Thyself.” “ Nothing Overmuch.” Pediments, friezes and columns, all are gone. No vestige is left of the marvels which greeted the eyes of the visitors of old, who accompanied Creusa when she came to consult the God. The exclamations of these visitors remind one of the modern tourist.

Chorus α. “ Not ¹ only then in Athens the Divine

The Hydra, lo, he slayeth,
Of Lerna, he the son of Zeus,
With sword of gold.

Unwarlike, doth another slay
Of sons of Earth — the Bacchic
God! ”

As we stood upon the ancient pavement, the solemnity of the spot was overpowering. We could feel amid the silence of these ruins, in this lonely sheltered niche of the mountain, with the solemn gorge far below us, that we were indeed at the very centre of the world. For of civilization as we conceive it, Greece was, in those old days, the only exponent on Earth; and had it not been for the victories of which these stones bear witness, the very light of life in the world would have been quenched. Instead of liberty, the soft luxury of Asia with its soul-deadening tyranny would have smothered Europe. Indeed humanity was on the “ razor-edge ” of the balance when the hope of Greece was contained in the “ wooden walls,” and later when the last great stand was made on the Plataean Plain.

The first temple of Apollo is said to have been built of the wood of laurel brought from the Vale of Tempe. This was succeeded by one built of wax and feathers by a swarm of bees. The third temple was of brass; the fourth, of stone, built by Trophonius and Agamedes as in the Homeric Hymn; and the final one, of stone and marble, under the direction of the Amphictyons, who employed Spintharos as architect. The noble Athenian family of the Alcmaeonidae, wishing to secure the powerful voice of the Oracle in behalf of their restoration from banishment, undertook to carry out the plans, and instead of the ordinary stone of the neighbourhood called for by the contract, they employed Parian marble for the eastern front. Within the temple was the sacred quivering laurel of which the Pythian priestess was wont to chew the leaves before descending to the inmost shrine. Here too she drank of the water conducted from the spring Cassotis. Not only must the laurel quiver, but the sacrificial victim too must quake. Else there would be no oracular response. The priestess took her seat on the tripod which stood over the celebrated chasm whence arose the vapour of inspiration.¹ A learned archæologist has recently written an able essay to prove that this chasm was a pious fraud, or never existed at all. The myth relates that its existence was revealed by Coretas, a goat herd, who became intoxicated and fell in. In the temple could be seen, between two golden eagles, the sacred Omphalos, Earth's navel, whereon the eagles let fly by Zeus — one from the east and the other from the west — met and alighted. Near by was a golden statue of Homer, and the iron chair occupied by Pindar when he sang hymns in honour of the Pythian Apollo.

The founding of the oracle is described in the Homeric Hymn to the Pythian Apollo and in the prologue of the Eumenides of Aeschylus.

“Thence¹ thou didst come to Crisā, beneath snowy Parnassus to the gorge turned westward. Over it the cliff hangeth beetling, and the deep ravine runneth under. Rugged is the spot and there Lord Phoebus Apollo resolved to build him a lovely temple and thus he spake: ‘Here I bethink me to build an exceeding beauteous fane, that it may be a place of divination for all mankind. Hither they shall bring me their perfect hecatombs for ever, men who dwell in fertile Peloponnesus, in Europe, and amid the sea-flowed islands, coming to consult my oracle. And to them I fain would declare my unfailing counsel and utter prophecy in my rich shrine.’ Thus spake Phoebus Apollo, and laid the foundations. Wide they were and exceeding long, and on them Trophonius and Agamedes, sons of Erginus, dear to the immortal gods, placed a floor of marble. And the countless tribes of men reared the walls of the temple with wrought stones, to be a theme of song for ever.

“Hard by there flowed a stream of fair waters, and there Apollo slew with his stout bow a serpent of mighty bulk, a savage prodigy which wrought many woes to the men in the land, to them and their hoof-stretching herds. For indeed it was a blood-bedabbled monster.

“He¹ who encountered her was led by fatal destiny, until the time when Lord Apollo Far-Worker aimed at her his powerful arrow. She then, tortured with grievous pangs, lay greatly gasping and writhing on the ground. Awful was the cry she uttered, unspeakable. Then she glided hither and thither through the wood till at last she panted forth her life in blood. Then Phoebus Apollo exulted.”

The she-dragon is left to rot² in the sun, and this circumstance gives to the place the name of Pytho. Apollo turns his attention to the establishment of the rites of his worship:

“Then³ Phoebus Apollo considered in his heart what men he should introduce to his holy rites, men who should worship him in rocky Pytho. Now while he pondered, he marked a swift ship upon the wine-faced sea. And therein were many goodly men, Cretans from Minoan Cnossus, men who should offer service to the Lord and declare the divine will of Phoebus Apollo of the golden sword, whatsoever he should utter in oracles from the laurel shrine, forth from the hollow breast of Parnassus. They were sailing in their black ship, in pursuit of traffic, bound for sandy Pylos and the people of Pylos. Then Phoebus Apollo went forth to meet them, and plunged into the sea in likeness of a dolphin, close to the black ship, and floated there, a monster great and dire; nor could any of the men devise the meaning. Tossing on every side, he lashed the ship's beams, while the mariners crouched in the vessel dumb with terror."

The dolphin guides the ship by a south wind past her destination, in spite of the wish of some of the sailors to land. The ship refuses to obey her helm. At last they reach the mouth of the Gulf, when a west wind springs up, and they are wafted into the Bay of Crisa.

"And¹ they came to far-seen vine-clad Crisa, to the harbour. And there Lord Apollo Far-Worker darted away from the ship, like unto the Sun at noon, and from his head flew sparks in showers, and the brightness thereof came to heaven. Then he sped to his shrine and passed on to the famous tripod. There he kindled a blaze, manifesting forth his weapons. And the gleam covered all Crisa. And the wives of the Crissaeans and their fair-girdled daughters raised the cry of holy joy beneath inspiration of Phoebus. For he put mighty awe in the heart of each one.

“ Thence like a dream he leaped to fly again to the ship, in likeness of a stout warrior in the prime of youth, his broad shoulders covered with his flowing locks. Then having uttered winged words, he spake to the sailors: ‘ Strangers, who are ye, and whence sail ye the path of the waters? Is it in pursuit of traffic, or do ye roam at random, as the pirates do, who rove o’er the salt sea, setting their lives at stake, and carrying evil to foreigners? Wherefore do ye thus sit stricken in soul, nor disembark upon the land, and stow the cordage of your black vessel? ’ ”

The captain of the ship asks the god concerning the land to which they have thus been led, whereas with far different intention they had sailed forth “ upon the mighty Gulf of the ocean towards Pylos, from Crete whence we claim to have sprung.”

“ Answering¹ straightway Far-Worker Apollo spake to them: ‘ Strangers, who used to dwell near tree-clad Cnossus, but who now shall return thither no more, to your lovely city and fair homes and dear wives. Here must ye abide and maintain my rich shrine, revered of all men. For, lo, I am the son of Zeus and I claim to be Apollo. Over the great Gulf of the sea I have guided you hitherto. I have willed you no harm, nay, ye shall here maintain my rich shrine, exceeding revered of all men.

And ye shall know the counsels of the immortals, and by their decree ye shall be honoured all your days for ever and ever.' ”

“ Thus ¹ spake Apollo and verily they hearkened and obeyed him.”

“ And ² they started to go, and at their head went Lord Apollo, son of Zeus. In his hand he held his lyre and lovely was the music he played. His step was high and goodly, and the Cretans followed on to Pytho, dancing and singing glad paeans such as are the paeans of the Cretans, in whose hearts
the Muse divine hath planted honey-voiced song.
They climbed the mountain with unwearied feet,
and soon they came to Parnassus and the lovely spot where Apollo was to dwell revered by all mankind.”

The Hymn ends with a word of warning:

“ If ³ there be faithless word or deed, or outrage such as often mortal men commit, then shall others come to be dictators over you, and beneath their sway ye shall be ruled by compulsion all your days.
All has been said — Guard well my words in your hearts.”

Aeschylus:

And beached his ship on Pallas’ shores marine,
He travelled thence to this Parnassus’ seat.

The hitherto rough places of the earth.
Here greatly did the people honour him,
And Delphos, sovereign ruler of this land.
And Zeus his soul with skill divine inspired,
And seated him fourth prophet on his throne.

These gods I worship in my opening prayer.

And next the nymphs I honour of the cave

² The temple of Pallas Pronaia is the first noted by Pausanias as he arrived by the Sacred Way. It has been identified as one of the small ruined temples of the so-called Marmaria. Shortly after the writer’s visit to Delphi in 1905, a boulder dislodged from Hyampeia caused serious damage to this group of buildings.

Corycian, dear to birds, resort of gods,
Bromios' haunt, nor leave I unrecalled
The time the god at head of Bacchant host Wrought doom to Pentheus, hunted like a hare.
The springs of Pleistos and Poseidon's might
And highest Zeus Consummate last I call —
Then take my seat on the prophetic throne."

The prominence of the oracle all through Hellenic times is tremendous. And not only the Grecian world, even Asia and Rome held the Pythian utterances in deep reverence. From the first priestess Phemonoe, who issued her prophecies in hexameter verse, through the long centuries of greatness and decline and renascence and at last suppression at the hands of the Christian Emperor Theodosius, we meet at every turn testimony to the influence of the Delphic Oracle. Often the utterances were ambiguous — the very name Loxias was fancifully derived from the obliquity (λοξότης) of the prophecies, — often doubtless they were corrupted for political ends. In spite of all, the respect shown for them even by men like Socrates and Cicero is to us astounding. Of the innumerable episodes in the long history of the shrine, we best recall the responses made to Oedipus and Orestes in the tragic cycle, the tale of Croesus, the message concerning the "wooden walls," the vindication of the sanctity of the shrine when the impious Persian pillagers were overwhelmed by thunder and lightning and the crushing cliffs; the inspiration which started Socrates upon his truth-seeking career, and finally the maxims of general or special conduct with which Hellenic story is filled. At last, when Julian the Apostate consulted the oracle with reference to his Persian campaign, came the last mournful answer from the prophetic tripod: "Say to the King that the dwelling place so rich in art is sunk to dust; Phoebus has no longer a roof, and no prophetic laurel, no speaking fountain. Dried is the fair water spring."

The hill slopes above the temple are covered with interesting buildings; but it is beyond the scope of these pages to describe in detail the Cnidian Lesche once adorned by Polygnotus, the Thessalian votive statues, the fountain of Cassotis: —

"Where ¹ from the depths is drawn for the libations Of fair-haired Muses, water pure and holy."

We must not pause to describe the Theatre and, high above the sacred buildings, the splendid stadium of the Pythian Games. The fine Museum too, with the world-renowned charioteer of bronze, the Lysippic Agias, the Cnidian frieze, the Sphinx of Naxos, and the charming dancing Caryatidae of Siphnos — all these belong to the province of the writer on Art or Archæology. This is true as well of the ruins of "The Marmaria," almost equalling in beauty those of the Sacred Enclosure itself.

We returned to our lodgings in time to witness a most glorious sunset over the lower heights of Kiona. A wild wind was blowing, and the scudding clouds were stained sanguine, while the mountain snows were lit with crimson glory fading into pure crystalline rose colour. The scene at first almost inspired terror; then, for a moment, triumphant exultation; then, as the fierce red light vanished in an instant from the flying clouds, there ensued a moment of awe, and at last the hurrying darkness brought hushed feelings of solemn peace.

CHAPTER X

PARNASSUS TO THEBES

THE Corycian Grotto is situated high above the town of Delphi about half way to the top of Parnassus. The first part of the ascent — the Κακὴ Σκαλὰ — is rough and steep. Anemones and other wild flowers of every colour cover the ground wherever the sun of March has melted the snow. Far above to the eastward we catch sight of the white crown of the holy mountain.

The way passes through pine groves and over stretches of bare rock, and, after a couple of hours, leads to the mouth of the famous cave. A rock near by bears an inscription which tells us that the grotto was sacred to Pan and the Corycian nymphs. The neighbourhood of the cave was a favourite haunt of Dionysus and his Maenads, and the mysterious lights beheld afar by awestruck peasants were believed to come from torches carried in the mystic revels:

“The ¹ lurid gleam o’er the two-peaked Rock

The Corycian Grotto offered a refuge to the fleeing inhabitants of Delphi when the Persians came, and many centuries later it served as one of the most important strongholds of the chieftains of the War of Independence.

Our visit to the cave filled the morning of our last day at Delphi, and on the morrow we started early along the Sacred Way.

From Delphi the road gradually ascends to Arachova. The gorge of the Pleistos was far below us on our right, and over the cliffs of Kirphis, which form its southern wall, we could catch occasional glimpses of the snowy tops of far-off Arcadian mountains beyond the Gulf of Corinth. We could not see the Gulf itself, but its position was marked by the thick banks of clouds which seemed to rise from it, often shutting out the distant mountains. On our left rose the slope of Parnassus, dotted by scanty evergreens. Occasionally we passed a few fruit trees in blossom, and here and there an olive; but the region is mostly barren save for the vines which produce the Arachovan wine.

Just before reaching the town, a bend in the road gives a last opportunity to look back at Delphi.

Arachova is no mean town in spite of its isolated position. The inhabitants are of pure Greek stock, and the women are handsome, while the men and boys are splendid.

After passing through the town, the road winds down the long pass of Parnassus. We soon came to the end of the well-built modern highway, and from this point travel became increasingly difficult. Clouds had gathered too, and soon rain followed; and we floundered over slippery rocks and through sticky clay, scarcely caring whether there was a path or not. The wild scenery of Zemenos, as this part of the pass is called, was grander and more gloomy for the storm. The clouds came tumbling down the cliffs on either side till they dissolved in fine rain, while the prospect in front was completely cut off. We were glad enough at last to take refuge for an hour in an old Khan built in Turkish times at a point about half way through the pass.

We were nearing the famous Σχιστὴ ὁδός, the triple cross roads of which the mention in the Oedipus Tyrannus fills us with shivering awe as they are named again and again. While the guides were preparing lunch, the account of Sophocles was read aloud:

“ Now ¹ Polybus of Corinth was my sire;
My mother, Dorian Merope, and I
Was held the noblest of the city, till
This chance befel me, worthy wonderment, —
Yet haply not so weighty as I deemed.
A fellow at a banquet, flown with wine,

Taunts me, as foisted spurious on my sire.
And I my wrath that day could scarce restrain,
And on the next, my parents I approached
And questioned closely — they th' affront received
With deep offence 'gainst him who spake the charge.
And I on their concern was satisfied;
But yet this stung me ever, sinking deep.
Unknown to parents, then, I took my way
To Pytho, and, unsatisfied in that I came for, Phoebus let me go, but dire
And woful were his other prophecies:
That I with my own mother should be joined
And bring to light a stock unbearable,
And of my father should be murderer.
And when I heard it, the Corinthian land
Henceforth I measured by the stars alone,
And fled to where I never might behold
The horrors of my oracles fulfilled.
And, in my flight, I reached this spot whereat
Thou sayest that this monarch met his doom.
And thou, my wife, shalt have the truth, — for when Journeying I approached that triple road,
There did a herald meet me and a man
Mounted on horse-drawn car as thou hast said.
And from the road the charioteer essayed
By force to drive me, and the elder too.
The man who sought to turn me from the path
— The Charioteer — in rage I smote; but when

The elder saw me passing by the car,
 Watching his chance, with double whip he struck
 Full on my head — nor equal pay received.
 For at a sharp blow from my staff he rolled Upon his back from middle of the car.
 I slew them all — but if of kin there be Betwixt this stranger aught, and Laius' house,
 What man more wretched in the world than I?
 Whom none of strangers nor of citizens
 May take into his house, nor e'en address.
 But all must drive me forth, and none it was
 But only I this curse upon me laid. . . .
 Nay then, nay then, oh holy powers divine,
 Ne'er may I see that day, but from mankind
 May I depart unseen e'er I behold
 Such stain of horror come upon my head! "

At the Triple Roads we turned northward, and made our way slowly through rough and lonely country. The only living creatures were the occasional flocks of goats with herdsmen in rough cloaks looking as wild and shaggy as their charges. After an hour or more of difficult progress, the prospect widened, and far to the northeast appeared the Boeotian Plain. Beyond rose the mountains which guard the ancient Orchomenos, and in the remote distance were the Euboean Heights, visible when the weather is clear. To us, even Helicon near by on our right was veiled in low-lying clouds. Our goal for the night was Daulia, a populous town commanding a wide view over the plain. It is ill built, and our quarters proved to be uncomfortable.

This is the ancient Daulis, the scene of the sad tale of Procne and Philomela. Ovid has told how the sisters were changed, the one into a swallow, the other into a nightingale, while the wicked Tereus became a hoopoe. The lament of the nightingale for the slain Itys or Itylus is famed in poetry ancient and modern.

A fragment of the Phaethon of Euripides refers to it thus:

“ And ¹ on the trees, the nightingale
Singeth her tender harmony,
Crying in loud lament
The woful Itys! Itys! ”

The chorus of Danaïdes ² in the Suppliants of Aeschylus compare their hymn of lamentation to that of the nightingale:

“ But if there be at hand
Some dweller in the land
Bird-tending, he will fancy when he hears
Our strain of tears
That he is listening to the voice

² Aeschylus: Suppl., 56-65.

Of her, the wife of Tereus, wise,
The nightingale, by kite pursued,
Who, from her native wood
And streams compelled to roam,
Mourns for her wonted home
In strange lamenting wail,
Mingling therewith of her own son the tale,
How by her hand he perished — murderous deed!
A wretched mother's fury was his meed."

"But ¹ the bird of lamentation
Suiteth well my soul;
Who ever waileth Itys! Itys!
Bird of mourning, messenger of Zeus."

Aristophanes in the Birds seems to ignore the most horrible features of the legend, and represents the hoopoe and the nightingale as reconciled and bound by tender conjugal affection:

"Come ² partner of mine, oh cease from thy sleep
And free thou the strains of thy holy hymns,
Which from mouth divine thou dost pour in lament
For thy Itys and mine, the often bewept.
And aye as it trilleth in numbers divine
From thy yellow throat,
The echo pure, through the leafy hair

² Aristoph.: Birds, 209-222.

Where golden-haired Phoebus the sound doth hear
And tuning his lyre with ivory bound,
To thy elegy answering, leadeth the dance
Of gods, and together in concord divine,
From voices immortal ariseth the cry
Of the Blessed ones' heavenly singing."

The journey from Daulia to Chaeronea was accomplished in a down-pour of rain, and the beauty of the scenery was almost wholly missed. Our way lay past the site of the ancient Panopeus, the birth-place of Epeios who built the wooden horse. Quintus Smyrnaeus gives an account of the dream which inspired Epeios to the undertaking, and his lines have much of the beauty of genuine Homeric Poetry: —

"When¹ now the stars were turning their path through the glittering heaven, Gleaming on every hand, and man his work had forgotten,
Then did Athene leave the lofty abode of the Blessed,
And, to the tender form of a maid in every way
likened,
Came to the ships and the host, and over the head of Epeios,

Ares-beloved, she stood in a dream, and quickly
she bade him
Build him a horse of wood, and said that herself in the labour
With him would toil; to this end herself had sped to his bedside,
Urging him on to the task. He, hearing the voice of the goddess,
Laughed in his spirit, and leaped from his couch of slumber unheeding.
Well he knew 'twas a goddess immortal, nor ever his spirit Pondered aught else, but aye he fixed his mind on the duty
Heaven-enjoined, and skilful the craft invaded his spirit.
When now Aurora came, to Erebus driving the shadows,
When too the fierce-eyed gleam of the day pervaded
the Ether,
Then did Epeios the dream divine, as he saw it and heard it,
Tell in the midst of the Argives, who greatly longed for the story
They, when they heard the tale, rejoiced with a gladness unbounded."

The western part of Boeotia was once covered with the shallow waters of the Copaic Lake, famous in the plays of Aristophanes for its delicious eels. Much of the lake has been drained within recent years, and a large and fertile tract has been reclaimed for agriculture. To the south stretches the chain of Helicon, the abode of the Muses, and as one advances, the great mass of Parnassus seems to rise higher and higher behind one and to brood over the whole plain.

Chaeronea was the birthplace of Plutarch, whose stone chair is still shown to the faithful in the village church. Hard by is the small ancient theatre with seats hewn out of the hill of the acropolis. Near the town, there is a common tomb of those Thebans who fell in the struggle against Philip. "Now¹ there is no inscription, but a lion is set hard by. And this refers chiefly to the brave spirit of the men. And an inscription is wanting, I think, because no destiny corresponding to their daring attended them." After lying for many years in sorrowful ruin, the great lion has lately been set on a high pedestal, and is visible from far across the plain. The crouching marble lion which used to crown the mound of Marathon commemorated the first triumph of independent Hellas against a foreign foe. The Lion of Chaeronea is a memorial of the final disaster, when independent Hellas fell beneath the Macedonian. Yet he is not crouching, but proudly sitting with head erect and an expression of mournful sternness. The spirit of Greece was not broken. The news indeed:

“ . . . of ¹ that dishonest victory
At Chaeronea fatal to liberty, Killed with report that old man eloquent.”

For Isocrates could look back over nearly a century of life to the days when Macedon was regarded as a semi-barbarous foreign kingdom. And yet the conquerors were not wholly foreigners, and it was but a few years later that Alexander the Great, who won his spurs on the fields of Chaeronea, was to carry the name and fame of Greece to the uttermost parts of the earth.

Demosthenes, who took part in the battle and shared in the general flight, was chosen to pronounce in the Ceramicus, at Athens, the funeral oration over the Athenians who fell on the field, and whose bodies were given up by Philip for burial in their native soil. The Funeral Oration which appears in the collection of the works of Demosthenes is of doubtful authenticity, though it contains many fine passages:

“ But ² it results of necessity that when a battle takes place, one side is defeated, the other victorious. Now I should not hesitate to say that in my opinion, those of either side who die in the ranks share not in the defeat, but that both alike are victorious. For victory is apportioned to the survivors according as Heaven grants; whereas that which each man could contribute to victory, every man who has stood his ground has fulfilled. But if as mortal he has met his allotted fate, it is by fortune he has received that which has befallen him, in spirit he has not been worsted by his adversary. . . .

“Now¹ the surviving kindred of these men indeed deserve pity, for they have been bereft of such heroes and disjoined from long and loving companionship; and they see the fortunes of their fatherland desolate, and full of tears and mourning. But, rightly considered, Heaven has granted these men to leave behind them, not for a brief space, but for long and unending time, a glorious memory that grows not old. In the light of this their sons shall grow up famous, and their parents shall be maintained in an honoured old age with the renown of these their sons for consolation to their grief.”

At Chaeronea we took the train for Athens. The gray lion at last faded from our sight far across the Boeotian Plain, and the afternoon sun dispersed the clouds on Helicon just before it was too late. Behind us, the great round brow of Parnassus looks forth over the whole valley, and is not lost to sight till one is nearly at Thebes. The Plain is full of memories both mythical and historical; but the history is of treason and civil strife, and the myths are tales of horror. We rounded the rugged hill where the Sphinx once dwelt and reached Thebes.

The smiling little town is different enough now from the stately city of the seven gates and the seven fountains, the scene of the birth and vengeance of the Bacchic god, of the horrors of the house of Oedipus, and of the treason of the people when the Persians came. The Spring of Dirce can still be seen, and the archæologists can guess approximately the positions of some of the Seven Gates. But the real Thebes is ours forever in the great dramas of Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides.

The Mighty Seven lead on their hosts against the beleaguered city:

“ I ¹ cry dread woes and mighty!
 An host is come upon me.
 Leaving its camp, it poureth,
 Yon throng of horse precursor!
 The dust to heaven rising is my witness,
 Bearer of tidings true though speechless.

“ And, ever nearer to mine ears,
 My country’s plains, hoof-smitten,
 Bring the loud shouting.

Wilt thou forsake thine own?

Which once thou heldest dear!
Gods of our country, city-warding, come, oh, come!

Praying deliverance from thralldom.
For round our city,
By breath of Ares driven,
Roareth a wave of men with bending crest.
But oh thou All-fulfilling Zeus,
With all thy power succour
That we fall not to our foes!

The Argives circle
In awful panoply of war.

The bridles, bound upon their horses' jaws

Clang slaughter.

Seven mighty chiefs, conspicuous 'mid the host,

With spears against our seven gates

Press close, by lot appointed."

Before the palace gates stands Oedipus, the hero king, now blind and fallen while the people wonder:

"Citizens¹ of Thebes ancestral, yonder Oedipus behold!

Him who solved the famed enigma and was worthiest
of men.

Who upon the City's fortunes with no eye of envy gazed,

Lo, in what a wave of sorrow awful he hath now been whelmed.

Therefore one who is a mortal, to behold yon final day

Looking, it indeed behoveth none to deem a happy man,

Ere the goal of life he passeth, having suffered naught of pain."

of the God upon the infidel king Pentheus. The Choruses of the play are full of beauty. There is a wild, mystic, almost oriental frenzy in the songs of the maenad rout that followed the strange young god to the mad revels on Cithaeron:

“ Oh ¹ Thebes, the nurse of Semele,
Crown, crown thy head with ivy,
Teem, teem, with verdant smilax fair and fruitful,
Come join the Bacchic revel
With boughs of oak and pine.

With tufts of silvery fleeces.

“ The sportive fennel toss in holy mirth
Soon the whole land shall join the dance,
When Bromios leadeth forth his band,
To the mountain, to the mountain,
Where the female rout awaiteth,
From loom and distaff far,
By Dionysus frenzy goaded. . . .

“ Oh happy he who on the hills,
After wild running dance,
Fainteth to earth, who weareth
The holy robe of fawn,
And seeketh blood of goats, the joy of flesh raw eaten,
As he dasheth to the mountains

The Phrygian, the Lydian,
And Bromios at the head — Evoe!

“ The ground with milk is flowing,
With winé and nectar of the bees.
Smoke riseth as of Lydian frankincense,
The Bacchic god, with ruddy pine flame
On thyrsus held aloft,
Leapeth with running and with dance
Urging his roving bands.
Rousing with cry he tosseth
To the wind his locks abundant,
The while with joyous roar he shouteth
Oh Bacchants Go!
Oh Bacchants Go!
Glory of Tmolus’ golden streams,
Sing Dionysus
With deep-thundering drums.
With Evoe celebrate the Evian God!
With shouts and Phrygian cries.

“ What time the pipe with joyful noise,
The holy pipe, its holy mirth
Resoundeth in accord with frantic wanderers
To the Mountain, to the Mountain.
And joyous as the colt
Beside its grazing mother
The Bacchant guideth nimble feet in leapings.”

The way led us past Tanagra almost to the Euripus. Far off the Euboean hills were lighted by the pink of sunset, and darkness overtook us before we pierced the tunnel of Parnes and reached the Attic Plain.

CHAPTER XI

OLYMPIA

THE visit to Olympia is apt to be the last of one's Grecian sojourn, for Patras, whence the Italian steamers sail, is a convenient place at which to spend the night en route.

After leaving Corinth, the railroad skirts the Gulf for hours through country of a markedly different appearance from that to which one has become accustomed in Northern Greece. Instead of a hard stony soil and exposed wind-swept hills, we were now in a land of smiling vineyards and currant plantations. Many pretty valleys run inland from the coast, winding their way between the green slopes of sharp-pointed hills of odd volcanic appearance. Villages are numerous and the landward view from the train offers an unending succession of pictures full of charm and interest. On the seaward side the contrast is complete. Across the peaceful Gulf, marches in lordly pomp the solemn procession of the mighty giants, Cithaeron, Helicon, Parnassus, Kiona, and Korax — on to the Golden Gate of Rhium and Antirrhium, which recalls not a little the wonderful Western Portal of the American Continent.

After leaving Corinth, we had a fine view of the ancient temple, with Acrocorinthus rising in the background. We sped through a level tract almost wholly devoted to currant vines. The trade in currants is perhaps the chief source of wealth to Greece at the present day. Sicyon is the first station of importance, and at this point we took leave, for a time, of literary and historical associations, — at least such as are connected with the classic days of Grecian story. After Sicyon we entered Achaea, where associations belong chiefly to the days of the decline and the Roman Conquest. Phormio's naval victory in 429 B. C. took place not far from Naupactus, which was situated on the northern shore of the Gulf near its narrowest point; but to most minds the name — in its modern form of Lepanto — recalls the far more famous sea fight of A. D. 1570, when Don John of Austria shattered the Turkish fleet.¹ Farther on is Missolonghi. Nothing in the annals of ancient Greece is more glorious than the story of this modern town. The desperate defence against the Turks, and the resistance of the inhabitants in spite of the most awful sufferings, till the very last extremity, afford one of the most noble examples of heroism recorded in history. Those who criticize the conduct of the Greeks during the struggle for independence — and there is much to deplore — ought not to forget Missolonghi. Byron died here in 1824, and his heart is buried here.

¹ The scene of the battle was a long distance to the westward of Naupactus. In fact much of the fighting took place actually outside the mouth of the Gulf of Corinth. Cervantes lost an arm in the battle.

The Gulf expands beyond Rhium, and Mount Panaetolium appears far to the north. Nearer rises Aracynthus, at the feet of which lay the ancient Calydon, dear to lovers of Atalanta swift of foot. Apollodorus tells the tale of the Calydonian hunt:

“ Of ¹ Oeneus, ² Althaea bore a son Meleager who they say was really sprung from Ares. But when he was seven days old, they say that the Fates came and declared that Meleager would die, so soon as the brand burning on the hearth should be burned out. On hearing this, Althaea plucked the brand from the fire, and laid it in a chest. But Meleager, having grown to be a man invulnerable and noble, died in the following wise. Of the year's crops which grew in the land, Oeneus, sacrificing first fruits to all the gods, forgot only Artemis. But the goddess in wrath sent a boar excelling in size and strength, who rendered the country sterile, and destroyed the herds and the men who crossed his path. Against this boar Oeneus summoned the noblest from all Greece, and to him who would slay the beast, he promised to give the hide as reward of valour. Now those who gathered to the hunt of the boar were these: . . . and Atalanta, daughter of Schoeneus from Arcadia, and the sons of Thestios. And when they came together, Oeneus feasted them nine days. But on the tenth, when Cepheus and Ancaeus and certain others declined to go forth to the hunt in company with a woman, Meleager, . . . wishing to win the love of Atalanta, compelled them to go with her to the hunt. Now when they had surrounded the boar, Hyleus and Ancaeus were destroyed by the beast, and Peleus accidentally pierced Eurytion with his javelin. But Atalanta first shot the boar in the back, and Amphiaraus next, in the eye. But Meleager smote him in the flank and slew him, and having received the hide gave it to Atalanta. But the sons of Thestios, deeming it shameful that a woman should win the prize when men were present, took from her the hide, saying that it properly belonged to them on the score of relationship, if Meleager chose not to keep it. Then Meleager in anger slew the sons of Thestios, and gave back the hide to Atalanta. But Althaea, in grief at the death of her brothers, set the brand on fire, and Meleager suddenly perished."

A manuscript of Bacchylides was discovered in Egypt a few years ago, to which we are indebted for the fine poem from which the following description of the fate of Meleager is taken.

(Heracles in Hades encounters Meleager who tells the tale:)

“ Then ¹ him with tears addressing, Meleager:

“ ’Tis hard for men on earth

The will of gods aside to turn —

For Oeneus, smiter of the steed,

The wrath of holy white-armed Artemis

Had else appeased,

My sire, by offerings of many goats

And dun-backed bulls.

But unsubdued her fury

The maiden goddess kept,

And sped to Calydon’s fair fields

A boar of prowess wide, in battle shameless.

Where he, with deluge-might,

The vineyard with his tusks did shear,

Slaughter the herds and whosoe’er

Of mortals came to face him.

Right valiantly we heroes of the Greeks

In hateful strife withstood him,

Six days together, till at last

Heaven gave th’ Aetolians victory, and we buried

Those whom the boar wild-roaring slew,

Leaping with violence.

Thestios’ daughter of valiant spirit,

Ill fated mother mine,

Contrived my death, woman of dauntless heart,
And from the carven chest,
The brand with swift doom fraught,
With lamentation loud she took and burned.
But this when I was born,
Destiny spun to be my bound of living.

And short to me sweet life
With failing strength I knew. Alas!
Breathing my latest breath I wept,
Unhappy, splendid youth forsaking.

“ — They say Amphitryon’s son,
Who ne’er the battle shout had feared,
Then only dewed his eyelids
In pity for the fate of him who suffered;
And answering thus he spake:
‘For mortals best unborn to be
Nor e’er behold the splendour of the sun,
But naught availeth us to mourn these things.’ ”¹

Travellers to Olympia usually spend the night at Patras and take thence a morning train which reaches Olympia about noon. This journey round the corner of Peloponnesus is an interesting one. Landward we have fine views of Panachaicon and

Erymanthus — the haunt of the boar slain by Heracles — and seaward are the beautiful Ionian Islands.

“Dulichion, Same, and woody Zacynthus.”¹

Dr. Dörpfeld is an able champion of the doctrine that Leucadia, the Promontory of the Lover's Leap, is in reality the Ithaca of Odysseus; although the island now called Ithaca has held the name ever since the period immediately succeeding the time of Homer. The Ithaca of to-day seems to nestle under the protection of its mighty neighbour Cephallenia,² which rears its snowy crown high out of a sapphire sea.

“Rough,³ but a good nurse of heroes, I surely at least can discover
No other land upon earth more sweet than the land of one's fathers.”

Olympia is at the confluence of the Cladeos and the Alpheios, the same Alpheios who wooed the unwilling Arethusa, pursuing her beneath the sea even to distant Sicily where now:

² Probably the ancient Dulichion.

³ Homer: Odyssey, ix. 27.

“ Like¹ friends once parted
Grown single-hearted
They ply their watery tasks.”

Shelley is more musical than geographically exact when he places Arethusa's couch of snows on the Acroceraunian mountains which are in far off Epiros.

“ And² other such tales are related concerning the Alpheios, that he was a huntsman and that he loved Arethusa, and that she also was wont to hunt. And they say that Arethusa, unwilling to wed, passed over to the island near Syracuse, called Ortygia, and there from a woman became a fountain. And that from his passion the change to a river befel Alpheios also. These things belong to the tale of Alpheios with reference to Ortygia. But that he went through the sea and there (i. e. in Ortygia) mingled his waters with the fountain, it is not possible for me to disbelieve; for I know that the god at Delphi agrees with this, who when dispatching Archias the Corinthian, to the colonization of Syracuse, spoke these words:

“Ortygia lieth an isle in the misty waves of the ocean,
Near the Trinacrian shore where gusheth the mouth of Alpheios,

Mingling his waters with those of the fair-flowing fount Arethusa."

The two rivers of Olympia held a prominent place in the Greek imagination. We find them mentioned frequently in poetry and prose, and their personified forms occupied the corners of the eastern pediment of the great temple of Zeus.

Perhaps nowhere in Greece can the beauty of early spring be better appreciated than at Olympia. Instead of the bare gray hills and stony plains to which we have become accustomed, green fields spread themselves under a warm sun far along the valley of the Alpheios till they reach the feet of the low hills which divide Elis from Arcadia. The olive alone gives a sombre tone to a landscape. Here we have cheerful pine groves as well, crowning the surrounding hills, while the plain is dotted with fruit trees in full bloom, looking like patches of snow-white cloud. Showers are frequent at this season, but so are the bursts of warm sunshine ἡ δακρυοῦν γέλασσαι like Andromache of old. Nothing can be more complete than the contrast between Delphi and Olympia. At Delphi the stern "gorge of the mountain" was a fit setting to the dark warnings uttered from the Pythian shrine; while here all is bright for the gay festival and the brilliant days of the Peace.

The Hill of Cronos to the north of the Altis —

or sacred enclosure of Zeus — affords a fine point of view from which to look down over the mass of ruins of temples, treasuries, gymnasia, halls, votive-offerings, and pedestals. Earthquake has made wild havoc of the works of man, and scarcely one stone has been left upon another. Of the many famous statues, nearly all were carried off by robbers, imperial and other, and it is to a happy chance that we owe the preservation of the beautiful Hermes of Praxiteles. A landslide from this Hill of Cronos buried the statue in soft earth a few years before the earthquake which destroyed the temple of Zeus; and there in the Heraeum, within a few feet of the spot where Pausanias saw it nearly two thousand years before, the statue was found by German excavators. Part of the original pedestal remains where Pausanias saw it.

By far the most stupendous ruin is the temple of Zeus. Nothing remains in place but the pavement. The earthquake tossed the great pillars in every direction, and the mighty drums lie scattered east, west, south, and north.

In the temple sat enthroned the masterpiece of Phidias, the gold and ivory Zeus — one of the Wonders of the World. Near by, the faithful could see in the pavement the mark made by the thunderbolt which the god hurled in token of approval. The inspiration of the statue was drawn, it is supposed, from the lines of the Iliad:

“ Thus ¹ spake the son of Cronos and nodded with dark gray eyebrows,
Then in full strength flowed down the ambrosial
locks of the monarch,
Down from his head immortal; — and mighty Olympus was shaken.”

One can spend many an interesting hour in wandering through the ruins of the Temple, Council hall, Gymnasium, or Wrestling-court, of this wonderful precinct; but it is not within the scope of these pages to give a detailed account of them. Here and there we find some object of special interest such as the basis on which stood figures of the nine Greek warriors who drew lots for the duel with Hector. Nestor stood opposite, shaking the lots in his helmet: “ ‘Nay,² but not even those of you who are chieftains of the united Achaeans, do eagerly press forward to meet Hector face to face.’

“ Thus spake the old man chiding, but all nine rose up. First of all Agamemnon, Lord of men, started to his feet. Close upon him sprang up stout Diomed, son of Tydeus. Then, clad in warlike prowess, the Ajax pair; Idomeneus too, and Meriones, his follower, rival to Enyalios, Slayer-of-men. Next after these rose Eurypylus, Euaemon’s splendid son; then Thoas, son of Andraemon and Odysseus the godlike. These all were eager to do battle with glorious Hector. Then in the midst Nestor, the Knight Gerenian, spake again:

“ ‘ Shake now the lot right throughly to see whose portion this shall be. For that man shall bring blessing to the well-greaved Achaeans, aye, and his own soul shall bless, if it be his fortune to survive the foeman’s sword and the cruel fray.’ Thus spake Nestor, and each warrior marked his lot, and cast it into the helmet of Atrides Agamemnon. Then the people prayed and lifted up their hands to the gods. And thus spake each with eyes fixed on broad heaven: ‘ Oh Father Zeus, grant that the lot fall on Ajax or the son of Tydeus or on golden Mycenae’s king himself.’ Thus they prayed and Nestor, Knight Gerenian, shook the lots; and out from the helmet leaped the lot of him whom all desired. The lot of Ajax it was, and the herald carried it everywhere throughout the throng, and showed it in order due to each chief of the Achaeans. They recognized it not, and each denied it his. But when the herald, as he carried it throughout the throng, came to him who had marked and cast it in the helmet, to glorious Ajax; then verily the hero held forth his hand, and the herald approached and placed the lot therein. Then Ajax, when he scanned it, knew the mark of the lot, and rejoiced in heart. Then he cast it on the ground at his feet and spake: ‘ Oh friends, surely the lot is mine, and greatly I rejoice in spirit; for surely I think to conquer godlike Hector.' "

Below the now empty platform on which were built the Treasure-Houses of the various States which took a prominent part in the games, stood a row of statues of Zeus, known as Zanes, and interesting to us from the fact that they were put up at the expense of those who were judged guilty of having violated athletic rules.

The Stadium seems not to have been provided with marble seats, as was the case at Athens and Delphi. The starting marks have been found and little else. The Hippodrome, where the great chariot races occurred, lay nearer the river, which has long since buried all traces of it under deep deposits of earth.

The Olympic Games far surpassed in importance the periodic contests which took place at Delphi, the Isthmus, and other parts of Greece. Pindar sings of them:

“ Water ¹ is best of things created
And gold, as in the night a blazing fire,
Shineth all lordly wealth beyond.
But if, my heart, thou dost desire
To sing of contests won,
No longer seek for other planet
Gleaming by day through ether waste

With warmth beyond the sun,
Nor can I tell of struggle than Olympia's nobler;
Whence doth arise the hymn renowned,
In poet's heart,
The praise of Cronos' son to sound."

The celebration of the Games was the supreme festival of the Hellenic world, and during the "Holy Month" in which it took place,¹ the Echecheiria, or Truce of God, produced for a moment a cessation of the almost perpetual fratricidal strife between the States of Hellas. Events in Greek history were dated by Olympiads, beginning with 776 B. C., when Coroebus was victor. It is curious to consider the parallel existing between ancient and modern highly civilized peoples. Great Britain and the United States — and, it is said, Japan, à propos of the great wrestling contests — as did Hellas of old, indulge in the most extraordinary outbursts of enthusiasm over victors and victories in athletic sports, pugilism, and horse-racing. In Greece, while the actual prize of victory might be merely a wreath of olive, pine, or laurel, the successful contestant was exalted to the skies. Poems were written in his honour. His native town received him in triumph, and heaped rewards upon him. Nay, the town itself became famous through his deed. The owner of a victorious chariot, even the horses who won the race, furnished inspiration to the greatest poets of Greece.

“ White-armed ¹ Calliope

And sing the Son of Cronos,
Olympian Zeus, the ruler of the Gods,
Alpheios with his stream unwearying,
The might of Pelops sing and Pisa.²

His feet in race victorious,
Hath magnified

The flower of Blessedness.”

Pindar never wearies of describing the sacred precinct of Olympia, and the reward that victory in the games vouchsafes to mortals:

“ Mother⁴ of Contests golden crowned, Olympia, Mistress of Truth, where prophets seek
To test by sacrifices burning, Zeus of the gleaming thunderbolt, if he Will grant response concerning
Those men whose hearts are fain

Great glory and repose from toil to gain!
The boon of piety their prayers obtain.

Great is for evermore his fame, on whom Thy glorious guerdon doth attend.
On divers men divers rewards descend;
And if the heavens bless,

The chief treasures of the museum are the Hermes of Praxiteles, the Niké of Paeonius, and the Pediment-sculptures and a few Metopes from the temple of Zeus. The Hermes is not very well placed. He carries on his arm the infant Dionysus, who, after his miraculous delivery from the thigh of Zeus, was entrusted to his elder brother to convey to the care of the nymphs. The serious, almost sad face is not what we might have expected from the pictures in literature of a sprightly god, noted for trickery and mischievous pranks. This Hermes does not belong to that morning of the world depicted in the Homeric hymn:

“ Then ¹ she gave birth to a son of shifty and wily devices,

He was a thief, and a looter of cattle, conductor of dreamings,
Spy of the night, gate-watcher was he, and quickly was destined Deeds of famous renown to manifest 'mid the
immortals.
Born at the dawning of light, at midday he played on the lyre,
Evening beheld him the thief of the herds of Apollo Far-Darter,
All on the first four days when queenly Maia had borne him.
Now when he sprang to the light from the womb
of his mother immortal,
No long time did he lie in his sacred cradle reposing.
Nay, with a leap he darted in quest of the herds of Apollo,
Over the threshold, passing the gate of his high-roofed cavern."

This Hermes belongs to the time when the world had become sophisticated, enlightened, and saddened; but he is very beautiful, and of priceless value as being the only original statue ¹ in the world which was, we may confidently believe, the work of one of the great sculptors of the great period.

ment.

The sculptures of the Eastern Pediment represent the actors in the famous story of Pelops and Hippodameia. The founding of the Olympic festival is attributed to Heracles; but the contest of Pelops and Oenomaus is the mythical prototype of the famous races of historic times.

“The¹ Greeks say this Myrtilos was son of Hermes, and that he was charioteer to Oenomaus, and whenever anyone came wooing the daughter of Oenomaus, Myrtilos with skill urged on the horses of Oenomaus, while the latter, in the race, as he drew up on the suitor, would pierce him with his javelin.”

The story runs that Pelops bribed Myrtilos to pull out the linch-pin of the chariot of Oenomaus. This treachery enabled the victorious Pelops to visit Oenomaus with the punishment that had befallen previous suitors. Thus Hippodameia was won; but when Myrtilos asked for his payment, Pelops hurled him into the sea, known henceforth — as some say — as the Myrtoan sea. The drowning man uttered a curse upon the family of Pelops, a curse the fatal consequences of which were worked out in succeeding generations:²

Electra exclaims:

“Ah³ Chariot-Race of Pelops, Laden with sorrow long ago,

² See chapter vii. Mycenae.

³ Soph.: Electra, 504-515.

How to our land thou camest fraught with woe!
 For since the time when drowned Myrtilos slept,
 With grievous pains
 To utter ruin hurled from golden car,
 Ne'er from this house hath pain,
 Laden with sorrow gone afar."

Pindar tells the story in the First Olympic Ode:

" But¹ when at the fair-flowering age,
 Shadowed his dusky cheek the down,
 He thought of Hymen proffered,
 From Pisan father to obtain Hippodameia, her of fair renown.

" Then, lone in darkness going Beside the hoary sea,
 He cried aloud on the god heavy thundering,
 God of the trident mighty, — he Came close beside his feet — and Pelops spake:

" " If lovely gifts of Cyprian goddess please,
 Stay, oh Poseidon, Oenomaus' brazen spear,
 And carrying me on swiftest car to Elis,
 To glory bring me near.
 For lovers three and ten he slayeth,
 And thus his daughter's nuptials he delayeth."

Thus spake he nor in vain his prayer.
The God, him magnifying,
Bestowed a chariot of gold, and steeds
On wing unwearied flying.
And low he laid King Oenomaus' pride
And won the virgin bride."

After gazing at the great calm Apollo, serene amid the uproar of wild Centaurs and Lapiths in the Western Pediment, and at the floating form of Niké, we reluctantly left the museum, and turned our steps to the station. For the journey was nearly ended, and to-morrow was to find us in Corcyra, bound for Italy.

CHAPTER XII

THE STORY OF NAUSICAA

FROM the rains of March and the barren gray of mainland Greece a few hours brought us to sunshine and luxuriant spring. We could well believe that Coreyra was no other than the enchanting Scheria, the Island of the Phaeacians, and a drive through a land of flowers brought us to the very bay where Odysseus landed after long buffeting, as he swam by aid of Leucothea's wimple, and dropped asleep behind a coppice "foredone with sleep and weariness."

And this is the tale of Nausicaa:

"Then ¹ was Alcinoüs king, and with wisdom from Heaven was gifted.

So to his palace flew the gray-eyed goddess Athene, Seeking a means of return for Odysseus mighty of spirit.

Into the inlaid chamber she entered, wherein the fair maiden

Slept, in beauty of form resembling the goddesses deathless,

Fair Nausicaa, child of Alcinoüs, mighty of spirit.

Maidens attendant a pair, with beauty bestowed
by the Graces,

Slept at each side of the portal, and shut were the doors of the chamber.

She, like a breath of the wind, sped close to the couch of the maiden,

Over her head she stood, and thus with words she addressed her:

‘ Why, Nausicaa, thus did thy mother bear thee neglectful?

Lo, uncared for the heaps of glittering raiment are lying!

Nigh is thy bridal when thou must be clad in thy bravest attire

Offering, too, fair robes to those who shall lead thee in marriage.

’Tis from such things as these among men fair name is acquired,

Ay, and they gladden the heart of one’s father and reverend mother.

Come let us hasten to wash them when dawn ap-peareth to-morrow.

I too will follow to help in the labour, that thus the more quickly

Thou mayest speed, not long thou remainest a maiden unwedded.

Thee already the chieftains of all the Phaeacians are wooing,

Chieftains throughout the land where thy race also belongeth.

Come then, entreat thy sire renowned at daylight appearing,

Straightway to harness the mules and the wagon,
that so it may carry

Thee and the bundles of clothes, the girdles and glittering raiment.

Thus it is better by far than on foot to accomplish the journey,

Since from the city the road is long to the place of the washing.'

Thus having spoken, the goddess departed, gray-eyed Athene

Home to Olympus whereon, they say, is the seat of the blessed

Ever secure, nor by wind is it shaken, nor ever by shower

Wetted, nor resteth the snow there, but ether exceeding and cloudless

Spreadeth abroad, and through all a splendour of whiteness pervadeth.

Ever and ever therein delight them the blessed
immortals —

Thither departed the Gray-eyed, her counsel bestowed on the maiden.

Straightway Aurora came, fair-throned, and wakened from slumber

Fair-robed Nausicaa, she with wonder was filled at the vision.

Straight through the palace she sped to carry the news to her parents,

Father and mother beloved; and found them at home in the dwelling.

Close by the hearth her mother was sitting 'mid women attendant,

Spinning the sea-purple wool of the distaff — her sire she encountered

Forth from the door as he issued to join the illustrious chieftains,

Where to the council hall he was called by the haughty Phaeacians.

Standing close to his side, her father dear she entreated:

' Wilt thou not, dearest papa, bid harness the high-seated wagon?

High, with the well-running wheels, that so I may take the fine raiment

Down to the river to wash the clothes to my shame lying dirty.

Nay, 'tis becoming to thee thyself in the midst of the nobles

Councils to hold, thy person in garments spotless apparelled.

Lo, in thy halls five sons have been born to thee,
dearly beloved.

Two are wedded, but still three others are bachelors blooming.

These, to go to the dance with garments fresh from
the washing,

Ever are fain, and to me pertaineth the care of the matter.'

Thus spake the maid, for she shrank to mention by name to her father

Blossoming marriage; but all he perceived and thus he made answer:

'Daughter, I grudge not the mules nor aught thy soul can desire.

Go, and the servants for thee shall quickly harness
the wagon

High, with the well-running wheels, with a box-seat fitted upon it.'

Thus he spake, and commanded the servants;
who quickly obeyed him —

Forth the wagon they drew well-running, and speedily harnessed,

Leading the mules to the yoke, and bound them
under the wagon.

Then in a box the mother put food to gladden the spirit,

Food of all sorts and dainties, and wine she poured in a goatskin.

Then did the maid ascend, and took her place on the wagon

While in a golden flask her mother poured oil of the olive,

So it might serve for ointment to her and her women attendant.

Firmly she grasped the whip and the reins all glittering brightly,

Flogging the mules till they ran; and great was the clatter that followed,

Valiantly stretching along as they carried the clothes and the maiden,

Not her alone, for with her rode other women attendant.

Now when they came to the stream, the fair-flowing stream of the river,

Where were the basins old for the washing, and water in plenty

Gushed forth goodly and fair to cleanse the foulest of garments, —

There when they came, the maids unharnessed the mules from the wagon,

Loosed them and chased them down to feed by the eddy river,

Honey-sweet clover wild, — and the garments out from the wagon

Took in their arms, and o'er them they poured the water transparent.

Then in basins quickly they trod them in rivalry eager.

Now when the whole was washed, and cleansed each speck of defilement,

Carefully laid in a row they spread them along by the seashore,

Just where the pebbles were washed to the beach in greatest abundance.

Then did the maidens bathe, and smoothly with oil anoint them.

Luncheon they took as well beside the banks of the river,

Waiting until the clothes should dry in the gleam of the sunlight.

After the meal was enjoyed by attendant maidens and mistress,

Casting their wimples aside, themselves with a ball
they diverted,

Fair Nausicaa leading the song meanwhile for the players.

Like as when Artemis, Pourer of arrows, doth go o'er the mountain,

Down through Taygetus far, or ranging throughout Erymanthus,

Taking her joy in the chase of the boar and the deer swift-flying;

On her attendant the Nymphs, of the Aegis-Bearer
the daughters,

Nymphs of the woodland sport, — and Leto's bosom rejoiceth. —

Over them all she holdeth her head and her beauteous forehead,

Easily known above all is she, though all are so comely. —

Thus of her maidens she shone the first, the virgin unwedded.

Now when the time was at hand once more to be homeward returning,

When she had harnessed the mules, and folded the beautiful garments,

Then a fresh plan was devised by the gray-eyed goddess Athene

So that Odysseus might wake, and behold the beautiful maiden,

Her who would show him the way to the town of the hero Phaeacians.

Then did the princess throw the ball at a maiden attendant.

Lo, the attendant she missed, and it fell in the deep-flowing eddies.

Loud did the maidens shriek, and godlike Odysseus awakened,

Sat him upright, and thus in his heart and spirit he pondered:

‘ Ah me, whither again am I come, to the land of what mortals?

Can they be doers of outrage, and lawless nor knowers of Justice?

Or are they kind to strangers, with godlike character gifted?

Lo, to mine ears there hath come the female crying of maidens.

Nymphs can they be, who inhabit the lofty tops of
the mountains?

Or peradventure the springs of the rivers and grass-covered meadows?

Or am I somewhere near to men who are gifted with language?

Come, let me test them myself, and with mine own eyes behold them! ’

Thus he spake, and emerged from the coppice, the godlike Odysseus.

Horrid appeared he before them, disfigured by brine of the ocean —

Hither and thither in panic the maids ran out to the headlands.

Only Alcinoüs’ daughter remained, for the goddess Athene

Courage had put in her heart, from her limbs all terror removing.

Holding her ground she stood, and he pondered,
the wily Odysseus

Whether to clasp her knees and entreat the beautiful maiden,

Or, as he was, at a distance, with honey-sweet words to beseech her,

So she might show him the road to the city, and offer him raiment.

While he was pondering thus, it seemed the greater advantage

Standing aloof at a distance with honey-sweet words to entreat her,

Lest in her heart she be wroth if he clasped the knees of the maiden.

Forthwith honey-sweet words in crafty speech he addressed her:

‘ Queen, I embrace thy knees, be thou or goddess or mortal.

For if a goddess thou art of those who hold the broad heaven,

Surely to Artemis then, of Zeus most mighty the daughter,

Closest resembling I deem thee in form and beauty of stature.

While if of mortals thou art who the face of the earth inhabit,

Then thrice blessed are they, thy father and reverend mother,

Yea and thrice blessed thy brothers as well; their spirit full surely

Ever for thy sweet sake is warmed with pride and with gladness,

When such a blossoming flower they see as thou treadest the dances.

Ah, and most blessed in heart that man, all others surpassing,

He who shall load thee with gifts and home in marriage conduct thee.

Never have I before with mine eyes beheld such a mortal,

Man nor woman, as thou — Awe seizeth me gazing upon thee.

Thus, fair lady, on thee I look with awe and amazement,

Dreading to clasp thy knees. — Yet cruel grief is upon me.

After a score of days I escaped the wine-purple
ocean,

Yesterday, where meantime the waves and tempests had tossed me

Far from Ogygia's Isle, and Heaven hath driven me hither

Evils to suffer e'en here no doubt, for surely I think not

Yet will they cease — ere this, the gods will wreak
many misfortunes,

Nay, but oh Queen, take pity, for, after labours unnumbered,

First unto thee have I come, while aught of the others I know not,
Aught of the men who sway the rule of this people
and city.
Point me the road to the town, and give me a garment to clothe me.
If thou didst keep of the robes some wrapping when hither thou camest.
Then may the gods to thee grant all thy heart can desire,
Husband and home, and bestow a goodly spirit
of concord.
Surely than this there is nothing more blessed nor more to be prayed for,
Namely than when, in spirit agreeing, a wife and a husband
Dwell in a house together — to evil wishers a sorrow,
But to their friends a joy — and deepest their own hearts perceive it.' "

Nausicaa promises to grant the request of Odysseus, and tells him who she is. Then she calls to her frightened maidens:

" Thus spake the princess and called her command to her fair-tressed attendants:
' Stand, oh, maidens, I pray. Beholding a man
whither fly ye?

Surely ye do not fancy that he is some evil-wisher?
Nay, there existeth not that living man nor shall ever,

Who to the land of Phaeacia shall come hostility bearing.

Nay, for exceeding dear are we to the blessed im-
mortals.

Far, far away from mankind we dwell in the billowy
ocean,

Uttermost, nor to these shores do foreigners bring us their commerce.

This is some ill-starred man who hath come in his wanderings hither.

Him let us kindly entreat, for Zeus hath under protection

Strangers and beggars all, and a gift is blessed though scanty.

Wherefore, oh maidens, give both meat and drink
to the stranger,

Bidding him bathe in the stream where rocks from the wind give a shelter.' "

Odysseus bathes and dresses, and the goddess endows him with unwonted beauty.

" Thus the goddess on him poured grace, on his head and his shoulders.

Then he withdrew to a distance, and sat by the shore of the ocean,

Glowing with beauty and grace; and the princess gazed in amazement.

Straightway therefore she spake in the midst of her fair-braided maidens:

‘Hear me, ye white-armed maidens, I pray, that I something may tell you:

Surely ’tis not without will of all gods who dwell on Olympus,

Yonder stranger hath come to consort with the godlike Phaeacians.

’Tis but a short space since, I thought him unseemly to look on,

Now he resembleth the gods who inhabit the wide-spreading heaven.

Oh that a man like this might be called my own wedded husband,

Dwelling in this our Isle, and that here to abide might please him!

Maidens, offer, I pray, both meat and drink to the stranger.’

Thus Nausicaa spake, and they verily heard and obeyed her.

Meat to Odysseus and drink they offered, and set it beside him.

Then did he drink and eat, the much enduring Odysseus,

Greedily, — long had he been untasted of food and of drinking.

White-armed Nausicaa now of new devices bethought her.

Folding the garments she placed them within the beautiful wagon,

Harnessed the strong-hoofed mules, and up herself
she ascended.

Next she summoned Odysseus, and speaking his name she addressed him:

‘ Rouse thee, stranger, to go to the city that I may escort thee

Unto the house of my father, the valiant of heart, where I tell thee

Thou shalt behold the noblest of all the princely Phaeacians.

See that thou act as I bid, for thou seemest not without wisdom.

While through the fields we go, and are passing the labours of farmers,

Meanwhile thou with the maids, behind the mules
and the wagon,

Quickly proceed, and I the while on the road will conduct thee.

When, however, we come near the town with battlements lofty,

Gossip unseemly I fain would avoid, lest some in the future

Blame me, for they in our city are hard and haughty of temper.

Lest some gossip malicious may say, if he chanceth
to meet us:

“Who is this, goodly and tall, attending Nausicaa yonder?

Where did she find the stranger? Her husband he doubtless is promised.

Surely some outcast wretch she hath saved from the wreck of his vessel,

Some one of men from afar, since none have dwelling beside us.

Or in response to her prayers, some god, full often entreated,

Down from heaven hath come, and all her days she will keep him.

Better no doubt that herself hath sought and found her an husband,

Coming from far, for those of her own native land
she contemneth!”

Thus will they say, and to me 'twill be a theme of reproaching.’”

She points out a grove not far from the town,
where he is to sit and wait:

“‘Sit thou there, and abide for a time, until at the city

We may arrive, and reach the door of the house of my father.

Then when thou thinkest that we have come at last
to the palace,
Come thou too to the town of Phaeacians and see thou enquire Where is the house of my father Alcinoüs, mighty of spirit.
Easy to know is the place, and even a child might direct thee,
Innocent child, for to this the houses of other Phaeacians
No wise resembling are built, like the house of Alcinoüs hero.
Now when the court and palace contain thee, see that thou quickly Pass through the hall, nor stop till thou come to the side of my mother.
Her thou shalt find on a seat near the hearth, in the gleam of the fire,
Spinning the sea-purple wool of the distaff, a marvel to gaze on,
Leaning against a pillar, and near her her women are seated —
There too my father's throne is placed next that of my mother,
Seated whereon like a god he quaffeth the wine of the banquet.
Passing him by, thine arms about the knees of my mother

Cast in entreaty, that so the day of thine homeward returning Thou mayest speedily see with joy, though from far thou art travelled.
For if she in her soul be kindly disposed to thy praying,
Then there is hope for thee to behold thy friends
 and to journey
Home to thy well-built house, and to reach the land of thy fathers.'
Thus she spake, and lashing the mules with the whip
 all glitt'ring, Quickly departed, and left the flowing streams of the river.
Well did the mules run on and plied with their feet in curvings.
Bravely she guided the reins that the others might follow behind her,
Maids and Odysseus on foot, and the lash she laid on with discernment."

Once more only, we catch a glimpse of the princess, who now knows his story:

" Out ¹ from the bath he went to join the ranks of the feasters.

While Nausicaa fair, from gods her beauty possessing,

Close to the threshold stood of the strong-built banqueting chamber.

When she beheld with her eyes, she greatly admired
Odysseus,

And, having called him aloud, with winged words
she addressed him:

‘ Farewell, guest, and afar some day in thy fatherland dwelling,

Think thou of me, for thou owest to me the price of thy rescue.’

Answering her with words, the crafty Odysseus
addressed her:

‘ Oh Nausicaa fair, great-hearted Alcinoüs daughter,
So may Zeus decree, loud-thundering husband of Hera,

Home that I come, and behold the day of return
from my roaming,

That even there unto thee, as to goddess, my prayers
I may utter,

Ever through all my days, for thou gavest life to me, maiden.’ ”

The ship sailed westward, and at sunset we bade farewell to Greece, as the pink glow faded on the snows of the Acroceraunian mountains.

THE END.
